What's your gripe? Show up!

Here it is again, time for the wine and cheese-off party at The Varsity. This ancient and dishonourable tradition allows all gripes, squeals, grunts and snorts to have the floor for a couple of hours.

Come on up, 91 St. George with the beautiful second-floor view of Fort Book One pm is cheese-off time.

No student fares for U of T: TTC

By MARILYN EMERSON

The Toronto Transit Commission decided Tuesday that "the commission does not favor extending student fare privileges to post-secondary school students."

The commission estimated that the extension would cause a loss of revenue of $1,200,000, a loss that would eventually be turned back to the taxpayer when the Commission presents its budget. With the extension to graduate students, the price would rise to $1,400,000.

After recommending no special transportation rates for post-secondary students, the commission deferred the report on student fares to the Metro transportation committee for "their information."

In October, Metro transportation committee deferred a proposal for a month that all full time post-secondary students get the same reduced fare as high school students, seven tickets for $1.

Metro transportation passed the proposal to the TTC commission for further study in the area before deciding on the issue.

TTC general secretary Harry

Pettett and TTC treasurer L.O. Morley submitted their five-page report on student rates to the commission for consideration at Tuesday's meeting.

After being processed by the commission, the report was passed to Metro transportation committee requesting a report on the report.

It looks like there is to be no change in student fares in the near future, although there might be a mass production of photo-ID cards for high school students. No mention was made if fingerprints would be needed.

Members of the commission at Tuesday's meeting, in addition to vetoing lower transportation rates for post-secondary students, recommended that "management discuss with the Metropolitan School Board the possibility of introduction of photo-identification cards for use by students."

On the initial proposal of lower transportation rates for post-secondary students, Metro chairman Paul Godfrey and York mayor Philip White expressed concern about the taxpayer's dollar.

Afew facts the "op-ed" missed Nov 23/73

It is standard for Israeli spokesmen to brand as an anti-semitic every opponent of the cause of Zionism, and in particular every opponent of Israel's repeated waging of aggressive wars of conquest against its Arab neighbours. When this is combined with the reflex anti-communism and anti-sovietism still endemic in capitalist Canada, the result is an article like Ken Green's op-ed in Friday's Varsity, "Soviets threaten Israel's survival". Green opposes the "appeasement called delente", says "Arab 'anti-Zionism' is" something "the Soviets brought to them", and attributes to the government of the USSR the overall aim of annihilating three million Israeli Jews physically and three million Soviet Jews culturally, for an antithetical total of six million. (Green's clearly implied conclusion: the USSR equals Nazi Germany. Quote: "Again, in the 20th century, six million Jews may be sacrificed.")

Here are three relevant facts that ought not to be overlooked in any debate on this question.

*There would probably be no Jewish population in the USSR to-day (as there is not in Germany or in Poland) if the Soviet government had not organized the massive eastwards evacuation of Jewish civilians from the two-thirds of European Russia Hitler's forces were to overrun in World War II. The personal tragedies of those who did refuse to leave their homes underlines this fact.

*There might well be no State of Israel but for Soviet support at the United Nations in 1948, as many Zionist leaders such as Ben-Gurion freely admitted at the time.

*Along with other Communist governments and Communist Parties in the world, the Soviet government has always recognized and defended the Israeli right to national self-determination. The most recent joint declaration bearing on this subject was made at the Moscow Conference of Communist and Workers' Parties in June, 1969, and was joined in not only by the Soviet Communist Party but also by most of the Arab Communist Parties, including all those from the countries bordering the State of Israel.

Last Post replies to earlier letter

Not that the level of argument in Mr. Ladanyi's letter is high enough to merit a reply, but my getting attacked ad hominem is a sufficiently rare occasion that I did not feel I should let it pass unnoticed.

Mr. Ladanyi says that "several PQ members have suggested confiscation of non French property since 'les Juifs' are exploiting the Quebecois." Who were these people? Were they candidates? Is this part of official PQ policy? I would be very interested if Mr. Ladanyi could supply references, for I cannot remember any such statements.

I can remember that staunch federalist, Real Caouette, saying that his political heroes were Hitler and Mussolini. Perhaps Mr. Ladanyi's memory fails him on that point. Or perhaps he is not aware that the Liberal party of which he is so enamoured campaigned in Vancouver in 1935 on a promise not to give Orientals the vote. Or that the very model of Canadian federalism, Vincent Massey, while our High Commissioner in London in 1938, recommended that Canada accept large numbers of non-Nazi Sudeten German refugees when Hitler moved into the Sudetenland so that the pressure on this country to accept German Jewish refugees would be eased. Or that another great Liberal, Mackenzie King, expressed satisfaction in 1945 that the atomic bomb had been dropped on Japanese and not white folk. Or that a Progressive Conservative candidate in the most recent federal election was a man who had been tried and convicted in absentia in the Ukraine as being a Nazi collaborator and war criminal.

The point is that no one has a monopoly on racism in this country — least of all the independence movement in Quebec. That Quebec nationalism has had a racist and xenophobic element to it I do not doubt. That some of this element found its way into the Parti Quebecois I also do not doubt. But it is less important within the party than it was four years ago when Gilles Giguere was running around loose, and it has never been the basic thrust of the PQ, which on the whole has represented some of the more progressive tendencies in Quebec society.

Finally, probably the grossest instance of racist campaigning in the recent Quebec election, at least among the serious parties, was the Liberal party song, which suggested that the Pequistes wanted to make Quebec into "a type of Romania" and that a Romanian would "give his foot and eye" to come to Quebec where "my next-door neighbour is unemployed but watches TV in his car." Some people found it funny but if I had been a Romanian living in Quebec I'm not sure I would have appreciated the humour.

Smallwood: enemy of whale nation

Yes, the Queen, Nixon, and Castro have all met Joey Smallwood. So have 50,000 Pothead Whales met death under Joey's supervision. In the 1960s Smallwood encouraged minx ranches to establish in Newfoundland.

Joey, of course, owned one of the largest ranches. By 1965 50,000 Pothead Whales had been axed, clubbed, and stabbed to death to feed the minx, to produce fur coats for...you know who.

Joseph Smallwood is an arch-enemy of the Whale Nation. He has encouraged and subsidized whaling companies, mainly from Japan and Norway, to kill and process whales in Newfoundland, to the point where a dozen species of whales are practically extinct. Smallwood and friends are still profiteering in this manner.

Farley Mowat's, A Whale For The Killing passionately documents this rot in our species.

Reader criticizes recent editorial

"Racism will be around next week." That's what you said in your editorial last Friday attacking the SDS "toKKK burning". I'd like to hear you explain that one to the black workers gunned down in South Africa a few months ago, to Canadian Indians, to immigrants to this country (and to the ones who have been deported or refused entry), and to Giuseppe Puleo, who was denied adequate compensation because Dr. Ian Hector of U of T's Medical School said he was "culturally predisposed to play a sick role".

You say that the fight against racism at the U of T, and in particular the attack on the ToiKKK's Hitlerite "humor" is "divisive" — taking us from the "real issue" of the discipline code.

What are we fighting the discipline code for? For the abstract "right to demonstrate"? Or so that the important fights against racism, for library reform, defence of campus workers, and the jobs of professors, will go on. The discipline code is being imposed to stop these struggles, and it is in their defence that it must be fought.

All of your confused talk about the discipline code would be clarified if you would point out that we never have had the "right to demonstrate". Scores of students have been arrested at the U of T in recent years for peaceful demonstration. The university administration and president Evans have no intention of abiding by such a code anyway. The administration defends the interests of capitalism — by lawful means, if it can, and by lawless ones if necessary.

Take for example the ToiKKK burning. A peaceful demonstration was attacked by racists with the encouragement and protection of the administration. Brute Farce Committee members were on the roof of Simcoe Hall so that they could attack with water bombs a peaceful demonstration and peaceful demonstrators. This took place in the very week the administration is trying to push through a discipline code that will supposedly protect "the freedom from discrimination on the basis of sex, race, or religion", "the freedom to hold and advertise meetings", and will punish those who "endanger intentionally or recklessly the health or safety of any person on the premises".

The purpose of a discipline code should be to protect the rights of students, faculty and campus workers at the university from lawlessness like the promotion and encouragement of racism, from hoodlums like the "storm troop" water bombers, from late literature like the ToiKKK, from doctors like Ian Hector, from sociologists like OISE's Carl Berger who says black ghetto children's language "is not merely an underdeveloped version of standard English but is a basically non-logical mode of expressive behaviour".

Therefore we propose the existing code be dumped, and the following be put in its place:

Be it resolved:

"That, for the purposes of this motion, racism shall be defined as a) the advocacy or support of beliefs or doctrines which state or imply that one race or ethnic group is innately superior or inferior to another, or b) the justification of oppression of a race or ethnic group, or c) acts or statements which clearly reinforce such prejudices.

*That racism, so defined, is unacceptable, and shall be considered an offence against the university community.

*That a committee shall be formed to investigate any charges of racism brought against any member of the university. This committee shall be representative of the various segments of the university community. Charges of racism shall be quickly investigated through public hearing held by this committee. The purpose of this investigation shall be both to determine the validity of the charges and to educate the university public with regard to the nature of racism. The committee shall recommend appropriate action. The range of possible recommendations shall include exonerations, public apology, and other appropriate measures, and shall not exclude dismissal in the most extreme cases. If the committee recommends university action, the recommendation shall be forwarded to the administration and the Governing Council for implementation.

Toike cartoon divides, reinforces

Clearly the recent cartoon which appeared in the Toike Oike denigrating Italians must be condemned. Such displays serve to foster and reinforce racist prejudices which divide the majority of the population, setting one racial or national group against another. The only beneficiary in such a situation is the small ruling class which seeks to maintain its power and privileges at the expense of the interests of the majority. Over the years racism has been used by the ruling class as an ideological justification for economic exploitations, national oppression, and social discrimination. It is a major means of diverting attention from the real source of these problems—the capitalist system itself. Those who advocate and foster racism merely serve the interests of reaction and violence.

SAC, The Varsity, other student groups and organizations should come out openly against any manifestations of racism on this campus, including the recent cartoon in the Toike.

It is wrong to state, as Friday's Varsity editorial did, that because the discipline code is currently hanging over our heads we should organize against it first and then take up racism later. Both must be dealt with at the same time. The key question is how.

It is incorrect to call upon the administration to interfere in this matter. In calling on U of T president Evans to fire the editor of the Toike, members of SDS and those who supported them made the mistake of asking the administration to intervene in a student affair. The administration at this university does not represent the interests of students, faculty, or staff. Rather it represents and defends the interests of the tiny capitalist class which exercises control over this institution against our interests through its ultimate control of the wealth and means of producing wealth in this society.

Students can and must resolve disputes within the student population. The administration has no right to interfere. And no group which considers itself progressive should fall into the trap of welcoming such administrative interference.

It is unfortunate that while uniting with other students to fight administrative attempts to control students through a code of behaviour, members of SDS, with the apparent support of the RMG, insisted on calling in the administration to fire the editor of a student paper.

Racist attacks such as that contained in the Toike should be confronted by organizing a debate which provides a forum for an educational discussion and as well an opportunity to politically isolate those who advocate or condone racism.

The fuehrer would have been proud

Hitler fans don't fret. There's a new fan club at the U of T — the Campus Alternative.

The fuehrer would have been proud on Monday when a number of his admirers gathered together in the South Sitting Room at Hart House.

Fresh from his recent hitch with the Edmund Burke Society, Paul Fromm emerged from the meeting as the club's leader — orvis that Fuehrer.

Fromm stressed that he disagreed with "the tactics of the Western Guard," and said the new group should "educate" and not "alienate" people.

Asked if he agreed with the Western Guard's position on a White Canada, Fromm replied: "Well, what do you do with the Indians?"

Asked if he believed in a restricted immigration policy based on race, Fromm replied: "Not primarily."

Poor Fromm seems to think that racism is dead. However, he probably hasn't talked to Dr. Ian Hector who seems to think that Italians are "culturally predisposed to fake injury." And he probably hasn't talked to the editors of the Toike who feel Hector isn't all that bad. And again he probably hasn't talked to the people at Sunnybrook Hospital who seem to believe that blacks like to work nights.

Behind this group's attack on the left which it feels is spouting off "a diarrhea of untruths" there is a much uglier aspect to this group.

Racism has hurt, indeed killed, an awful lot of people. Racism is no joke, a point on which Fromm would likely agree but for the wrong reasons. The Campus Alternative is nothing to fear but the ideas it promotes are a threat to every one of us.

Hiel Fromm!

Budget summary: FEUT stepped on

Cutbacks in divisional funds are recommended by the budget committee's confidential report, with the health sciences, graduate students, and the Faculty of Education significantly affected.

Of all departments affected, the physical plant and the Faculty of Education were hit the hardest. Physical Plant's budget was cut by $700,000 and the Faculty of Education had $475,000 lopped off its 1974-75 budget.

Major recommendations of the budget committee are:

Health Sciences

• School of Hygiene — a reduction of $30,000 in the budget "in view of the low teaching loads in some areas of this division". The committee hopes there will be a speedy resolution of the future role of the school, currently under study by a joint task force of the Academic Affairs and Planning and Resources Committees. In the meantime, the committee feels that the school should not consider the expansion of its current activities outlined in its budget submission.

• Faculty of Medicine — a $50,000 reduction in the budget "through reductions in expenditures for research technicians and the removal of a position temporarily located in the faculty's budget".

The committee also recommends that a $100,000 increase be recovered from the operation of continuing education programs, and, added to this would be an expected $25,000 increase in grant income from treatment and rehabilitation funds provided by the Ministry of Health.

The committee also made "the following comments, observations, and recommendations for consideration or implementation by the dean and his colleagues":

• Family and community medicine program proposals require clarification in relation to the department's role and objectives; the traditional strengths of the university, the government's directive, and how the province's faculties of medicine propose to respond to it.

• Programs that overlap with those of the School of Hygiene should be reviewed to determine if more effective collaboration can be achieved.

• Staff members returning from training and research leaves should be considered as burdens in the faculty's long-range financial program rather than as additional and isolated budget requests.

• The committee recognizes a need for new and expanded programs but feels they could be funded by reallocation of existing resources or from alternate funding sources.

• Support service operations should recover a larger proportion of their costs, particularly those relating to research funding and programs.

• A review should be undertaken of the amount, nature, appropriateness and resource implications of activities of the teaching staff who have been providing a significant amount of instruction to a variety of health-related personnel in programs that aren't under the control of the university. The review should be undertaken to see whether cost recoveries might be obtained for the university.

• The dean should undertake a critical review of the faculty's programs and priorities; assess how effectively university and external resources are being used; make recommendations on the need for clinical teaching facilities and the university's responsibility for the provision of these facilities; and review the systems method of teaching, adopted by the faculty several years ago.

• Most of the full-time members of the clinical staff spend a significant amount of time in patient care activities as a regular part of their duties and receive income independent of the university; if the dean is to effectively plan the operations of the faculty, he must be able to exercise adequate control over the amount of activity in this area and have some control over the use of the funds generated by the activity.

• School of Physical and Health Education — Don Forster should launch a study of the school's program and plans in the light of available funds and facilities and in conjunction with Jill Conway explore the school's relationships with the athletic associations.

• Department of Athletics and Recreation and Department of Athletics and Physical Education, Women — the Internal Affairs Committee should continue to study the possibilities for increased coordination and sharing of facilities between the two department and with the School of Physical and Health Education.

• Health Service — $30,000 reduction in the budget.

Library

• $430,771 increase in the gross budget which will be offset by an increase in income resulting in a net budget decrease of $24,500.

• That the Library be allowed to increase the book fund at the end of the 1974-75 fiscal year by an amount equal to: (a) underspending in other expenditure accounts and (b) the excess of actual divisional income over budgeted divisional income. Also, this surplus would be allowed as a 'carry-forward' for spending in the subsequent fiscal year up to a maximum of two per cent of the library's net operating budget, estimated at approximately $160,000 for 1974-75. If funds in excess of the two per cent limit are generated, the library would be allowed to transfer 50 per cent of these into the book fund.

"The committee believes that this will give the chief librarian and his colleagues an important incentive to control staff costs for a purpose the library and many members of the teaching staff have identified as having a very high priority."

Food Sciences

• Budget reduced by $700,000; this will have a direct effect on the standard of maintenance, cleaning, and other services provided by the department. We expect that the reduction in budget will be accomplished through reducing use of outside planning assistance, cleaning service and postponement of large portions etc.

Faculty of Education

• A reduction of $475,000 and "that the $25,000 fund for travel currently included in the Faculty of Education budget be transferred to the general university travel account in Don Forster's office.

• Non-replacement of members of the teaching staff who resign or who will retire at the end of the 1973-74 academic year will account for much of this reduction according to the committee.

• The committee noted that a number of cross-appointments arrangements with other divisions of the university were cancelled. It states: "We believe that this action was not justified financially and, academically, was neither in the university's nor the faculty's long-term interest."

Division of University Extension

• A net decrease of $6,915; resulting mainly from increased costs stemming from the organization of a college which will enrol part-time students (College X).

School of Graduate Studies

• $30,000 reduction, to be applied to general administrative expenses.

• A recommended increase of $500,000 in the funds currently available in the budget of the School of Graduate Studies for graduate student fellowships and bursaries. This additional expenditure is, in our view, consistent with constraints imposed by the provincial government on the use of operating funds for such purposes.

• The committee recognizes, however, that "this figure is below the amount requested by the school and well short of the amounts suggested by the Graduate Students' Union," but believes that, "in view of the university's financial circumstances, our recommendation is both practical and sensible."

But the committee also recommends that "the level of graduate support be examined again as part of next year's budget review..."

However, the School of Graduate Studies had asked for $2.1 million and the Graduate Students' Union had requested $6 million.

Scarborough College

• Expenditure to be increased by $583,300 from its current base of $6,915,225, exclusive of the graduate instruction transfer, the administrative charge, municipal taxes, residences and food services.

• $510,000 recommended for graduate instruction transfer (based on 20 per cent of 1973-74 full-time academic salaries).

• $372,827 recommended for administrative charge, (calculated on the bases of six per cent of anticipated income in 1974-75).

• A $506,000 budget deficit forecast.

Erindale College

• Expenditure to be increased by $884,133 from its current base of $8,581,652.

• $483,000 recommended for graduate instruction transfer.

• $376,332 recommended for administrative charge.

• $900,000 budget deficit forecast.

Grades are the topic

By MARGARET ROBERTSON
At the Wednesday meeting, the Academic Affairs sub-committee on curriculum and standards began correlating statistics on grades across the campus.

Members were given material to study on types of grades and numbers of passes and failures in each faculty and department for the past several years.

Kenneth Long, an architectural student said the sub-committee members "hoped to have a good idea of how to proceed" by the next meeting on Dec. 5th.

Frans DeBruyn, an English specialist who has taken courses in other departments said that his grades have been fairly uniform, but "that does not reflect the amount of work that went into them."

The standardization of grades issue came up at the end of a session mainly devoted to approving the sub-committee's new guidelines, which will now go to the Academic Affairs committee for formal ratification next month.

Union warns NDP

By WAYNE ROBERTS

A trade union leadership got his licks in at the middleheaded professors, strident women's liberationists and Maclean's Magazine as Don Taylor lectured at OISE audience on the NDP and the common man, Wednesday night.

"The party needs to talk to people about what we will do in our first five years in office," the assistant to the national director of the Steelworkers argued, "and not how many angels will dance on the head of a pin in the socialist millennium." People want here and now answers, he continued. To present this, the party must avoid traps laid for it by "that patriotic book of etiquette, Maclean's Magazine."

This magazine, which glorifies prairie sunsets, Arctic snow and rustic Montreal slums as embodiments of unique Canadian scenery, is only content if socialists are screaming and foaming at the mouth in the isolated corners of pure principle, he said.

In reality, they are only a front group for the Committee for Indigenous Capitalists, he charged.

Professional women, who drop their children off at progressive nurseries, sip cocktails with the elite, and sip sherry at their expensively converted barns north of Unionville are also part of the conspiracy to misrepresent the party's eminently reasonable program for working women, he said.

The party's program is designed for the ordinary woman and must be made understandable to them, he continued.

The NDP must not violate the political culture of the majority, he said. He credited the NDP's success in British Columbia, Manitoba and northern Ontario to their being part of the mainstream political culture in those areas.

Barrett criticized

"What comes in with a sweep can go out with a sweep," Stanley Ryerson predicted in a Sunday night Washington lecture on Quebec's position in Canada.

Speaking of the recent Liberal electoral triumph in Quebec as a "triumph of blackmail," the history professor and Marxist scholar commented on what he called the historic tendency of Quebec politics to flow in patterns of one-party rule.

The Parti Quebecois is tapping polarizations that go to the roots of Canadian history, the Montreal lecturer continued.

The "conquest" is the first fact of Canadian history, and confederation offers no possibility of equality in an unequal union.

English speaking merchants continue to dominate Quebec life today as they have since "the conquest." The only difference is that the Americans now dominate even over English-Canadian capital.

Ryerson expressed little faith in the PQ, however. They are a petit-bourgeois party, he charged, with no possibility of leading a struggle of national liberation against the forces of American imperialism.

He also slammed B.C. Premier Dave Barrett for proposing unity of the NDP and the PQ on the basis of the PQ giving up its separatist program.

"We cannot reorder Canada on the basis of Quebec giving up its right to self determination," he insisted.

It is not only a pipedream but a dangerous threat to the solidarity and internationalism of the left, he stated.

Deal for resisters

WASHINGTON (CUP) — Nixon's Justice Department has proposed a new "solution" to the troublesome demand for amnesty for US war resisters.

It offers only the choice of army enlistment or jail. This proposal is even harsher than Senator Taft's conditional amnesty bill which would force draft resisters to spend three years in "alternative service" duty as the price for amnesty.

The US Army, however, seems to have some reservations about the new scheme. According to an August 29th editorial in the semi-official Army Times, "resisters are causing a sticky problem for the Government. Public sentiment is against sending them to jail."

Therefore, it concludes, other punitive measures must be found. The editorial cautions, however, that war resisters in uniform may be more trouble than they're worth.

There is some question about the sincerity of the Army's opposition, however, when one considers Defense Secretary Schlesinger's recent warning that falling enlistments may require resumption of the draft.

Also consider Army Secretary Bo Calloway's statement that he's "unconcerned" about the record black enlistment (35 percent) and is opposed to any quota for blacks. His attempt to sow fears of an all-black army may be part of a well-orchestrated Army campaign to restore the d.aft.

The military's attempt to recruit sufficient men voluntarily into the service has been a colossal failure.

"No resister in his right mind in Canada would take up an offer like that," said Katie McGovern, a counsellor with the Toronto Anti-Draft Programme.

"First, most draft dodgers came here to avoid two years in the army," McGovern said. "They're got to be kidding in Washington if they think dodgers are going to go back to enlist for three years."

"Secondly, the proposal says nothing about deserters. At least half the men in Canada are deserters and this idea won't do a thing for them," she said.

McGovern said the only amnesty her group would support is "universal, unconditional amnesty for all resisters, whether draft, military or civilian."

Police search files for deportables

Metro Toronto police are systematically combing through court records to find convicted immigrants to deport, and a group representing US war resisters is afraid of where this might lead.

On orders from police chief Harold Adamson, police have set up a special task force of three detectives and two clerks to search through thousands of criminal conviction records to find immigrants and then send their names to the immigration department for deportation.

"It sounds like it may be quite legal," said Katie McGovern, a counsellor with the Toronto Anti-Draft Programme, "but the problem is: just how far are they going to go?"

"Technically an immigrant convicted of certain offences under the Criminal Code and the Narcotics Control Act can be sent to a deportation hearing, but are the police going to use this as an excuse to round up illegal immigrants?"

McGovern said so far her organization has seen no evidence of that happening, but they are watching carefully.

She pointed to a statement by Immigration Minister Robert Andras last month when he said in Toronto there "are no plans for a witch hunt" of illegal immigrants.

The government's 60-day grace period for illegal immigrants to come forward and register ended October 15, and more than 49,000 came forward. But McGovern said there are "thousands maybe tens of thousands" of illegal immigrants from all countries who were too frightened or misinformed to come forward.

She said a "few thousand" of those would be US war resisters. Police report they are going through conviction records for the last five years. In general, an immigrant in Canada for more than five years cannot be deported for conviction for most, but not all, offences.

So far, just under 400 names have been unearthed by the police task force, and those names have been sent to the immigration department.

However, police are complaining about inaction from the department in deportation proceedings.

for people who walk on this earth...

If you've walked barefoot on sand or soil you know how great it is. Your heels sink low and your feet embrace the earth. Then you put on your shoes, return to the city, and become another concrete lighter... but the concrete always wins. You yearn for the earth that lies buried beneath the city.

The Earth Shoe is the first shoe in history with the heel lower than the sole... this helps return you to nature though you are forced to live in a cement-coated world. The Earth Shoe's patented design gently guides you to a more erect and graceful walk, and reduces fatigue and the aches and pains caused by our hard-surfaced city.

For men and women in shoes, sandals, sneakers and boots. From $23.50 to $42.50. Brochure available

Jimmy Olsen meets Zon-tar the Thing from Venus meets Dietrich...

Welcome to the 1940's. The world of Bogie, Cagney, Dietrich and Bacall. The hazy, smoke-filled, booze besotten clubs; the dim streetlamp-lit corner phonebooth; the frantic super scoop snoop city desk of a great metropolitan newspaper all remind one of the great legacy of Dashiell Hammett and Mickey Spillane. Juxtapose Gene Roddenberry's Star Trek and the sardonic irony of Rod Serling's science fiction on this nostalgic and oh so familiar movie scene and the hilarious result is Jackie Crossland's Bigger than both of us, now playing at the Global Village Theatre.

Sam Samson, ace reporter for the Examiner recounts the sad story of his past, accompanied by a bottle of rye and the ever-present, nightclub piano player (shades of Sam in Casablanca), Andy. Sam's lamentable tragedy is the loss of his girl, the nightclub singer and bad girl with-a-heart-of-gold, Stella Maris. Sam loses Stella to Bruce Foster who is, in fact, an alien from outer space sent to Earth to "find the time." Cadet Borax, the true identity of the alien, has been instructed that Time is kept in a watch. This watch is called Bulova, and may be found on the wrist of one Sam Samson. His mission: to acquire this watch, which keeps the Time, at any and all costs.

The comedy of the production assumes two levels: the parody of every Humphrey Bogart-James Cagney plot type B movie of the 1940's; and the dichotomy between colloquial English common to those films and the literal definitions assumed by the alien. For example, Sam's first entrance sets the whole tenor of parody in the show, as he enters into the Club Latino complete with James Cagney mannerisms and a Bogart-like line delivery. Even the dialogue is reminiscent of Bogart in Casablanca as Sam says to Andy, "Stella sang that." You expect to hear at any moment, "Play it again, if she can take it, I can." The superb undercutting and use of clichés delivered so devoid of feeling and so very straight, as in "She had class - she drank bourbon," or Stella's "I only want what every woman wants. A cottage," is another dimension of this parody.

Cadet Borax adds a new dimension of hilarity to the most hackneyed of late movie dialogue and action. Borax translates everything said to him in literal terms. The most obvious example is his idea of Time as a tangible object of the real world imprisoned in a watch. This becomes more complicated in a sequence in which the alien is told by Stella that because of her love for Sam, she could not "make time" with him. The imaginative possibilities are endless. Borax undermines and emphasizes common human behavior, and shows it to be superficial and ridiculous.

A serious note is hit in a musical number about Time, haste, waste and human selfishness and loneliness. Refuting John Donne's theory that "No man is an island," the song states that each person is a stranger moving in his own galaxy, to the rhythm of his own orbit. Every orbit has the urgency of a limit by the Time, the same futile urgency as expressed by Carroll's White Rabbit. The show closes with this disturbing feeling, well couched in laughter and parody.

Performances were well-handled all the way around. Greg Malone, as Sam Samson, is the perfect fusion of Bogart and Cagney, underplaying, thereby emphasizing superbly. He is equally matched by Elizabeth Murphy as Stella Maris who could easily steal the show with her huskily voiced nightclub number, and the fantastically funny apache dance she and Sam perform. Jake, played by Allan Migicovsky, the hard-nosed editor of the Examiner, contrasts nicely with Sam and Stella in his totally business-oriented frame of mind. Jeremy Newson, as the alien, pursues his role with an intensity and comic knowledge necessary to make Borax's naïveté believable.

Although Crossland's staging is, at times, careless and unimaginative, there are many beautifully executed vignettes. So, for all you late night movie buffs and/or sci-fi fans, Bigger than both of us is waiting for you at the Global Village Theatre.

Le Pendu loses comic strength through heavy-handed treatment

With Robert Gurik's Le Pendu, Le Théâtre du P'tit Bonheur continues its innovative policy of staging several avant-garde plays this season. Once again, this current production running until Dec. 15 fails to achieve the dramatic possibilities inherent in an experimental text.

Gurik's play about the fake would-be suicide Yonel selling pieces of his hangman's rope as good luck charms is to a large extent dependent on its mixture of naturalism, absurdism, allegory, broad farce and social satire for its success. For the play to work, we must first believe in the abject misery of the Quebec mining town in which the action takes place that drives Yonel and his father to their desperate scheme. We must understand the conditions that have transformed Yonel's father from a one time miner into a disgusting, despicable, self-indulgent paraplegic worried only about his tobacco and chocolate candies. Gurik thus specifies that the set itself consist of the entrance to the abandoned mine shaft in which the Father (he has no name of his own) has squirmed like a work on his belly for most of his life.

Under Andrei Zaharia's direction, virtually none of Gurik's stylistic, acting and set descriptions have been preserved. Gheorgi Felipe's rectangular set of wooden boards was non-descriptive and failed to throw the entrance to the mine into the required prominence. Someone's insane idea of passing out chalk as the audience entered to write their favorite slogan on the set implied that the events on stage were not to be taken seriously. Few, indeed, did. Most preposterous was Zaharia's transformation of the songs of Gurik's original singer-narrator (Robert Charlebois in the 1967 premiere) into a ponderous chorus in loud rustling black raincoats carrying lanterns, chanting ritualistically, banging hammers and whipping the ground with ropes.

This heavy-handed approach robbed the play of its comic content and obscured its actual meaning. For Gurik is both serious and comic. His Yonel is both a Christ figure attempting to save the world as well as a crypto-fascist intoxicated in his new found power. Michel Chappellaine as Yonel failed to relate his character creation to the milieu of the action and thus failed to motivate both his character and the action of the play. Louis Amiot as the Father, inexplicably dressed in a clean, neat blue costume, was neither sufficiently disgusting nor worn out to make his character believable and motivate the revolt of his son.

It is unfortunate that this company which has shown its comic strength in the previous Tempête should have infused this play with a heavy handed ritualistic emphasis when the author's text calls for humour, irony, satire and detailed character development.

Israel and the Arabs: the good guys don't always wear white hats

Maxime Rodinson seems to have a knack for being timely. When his Israel: A Colonial-Settler State first appeared in the original French in 1967, it was followed within days by the Six-Day War. The release of the book in an English version this year barely predated the outbreak of the current war.

His treatise is a slim but weighty volume discussing the roots of the current mess in the tortured Middle East. Rodinson (a French Jewish marxist, incidentally) documents the colonialist and even racist attitudes that permeated (and continue to hold sway in) the Zionist movement, including its socialist wing.

Early Zionist leaders continually appealed to, and bargained with governments stressing to them the advantages to the European imperialist powers of having a modern, capitalist outpost in the Middle East. They even played up to the anti-Semitism of European governments, in a tactic born of desperation, propagandizing Zionism as a means of removing the Jews from Europe.

When Jewish settlers began to move into Palestine, their attitude to the Arabs living there was typical of all Europeans of

For approximately a century, Arabs have had to put up with European colonialists, like this 1882 British sentry in Alexandria. No wonder they're a bit suspicious of the European Zionist.

Energetic acting can't save Concentration Camp

Concentration Camp For Words, Creation 2's most recent production, is certainly less than a compelling drama. Done in the Brechtian tradition, the play deals with a worn out theme in a worn out style.

A well-dressed young man steps on stage and begins to describe the workings of an encounter group held at the Institute for Linguistic Healing. We are eventually introduced to this very ordinary group of frustrated married couples who spend their time discussing vacations and money.

Mysteriously, the scene changes to a Nazi prison camp where the cast sheds their middle class apparel and don prison garb. This is supposedly triggered by the profound utterings of a misunderstood writer who describes the group as a concentration camp for words. What follows is an hour of dull embarrassing prison routine, the actors floundering about through choreographed sequences of eating and dying.

The action returns to reality and the play ends with the writer going mad on a talk show. The cast disperses leaving the audience to wonder exactly what the whole thing was about — Jewish persecution or modern psychology.

Perhaps the weight of the blame should lie with Louis Capson, director and creator of Concentration Camp For Words. Though not particularly proficient, the cast was energetic and did attack the melodramatic material with a vigour which was the evening's only redeeming feature

Charlie Brown has lovely kids, stupid dog, gobs of catharsis

"You're a Good Man Charlie Brown" is back at the Playhouse Theatre.

A play review? Oh no!
SCHROEDER: The name of the play about which, this play review is about is, Charlie Brown, which is about this loser...

LUCY: Charlie Brown is this funny play about these lovely children and his stupid dog and starring Lucy.

LINUS: In examining a work of the magnitude of You're a Good Man Charlie Brown, it is immediately apparent that the more superficial aspects of the comic situation are mitigated by the dramatic intensity of its cathartic tenor. Charlie Brown begins as a benevolent hero...

SNOOPY: Here is the world famous New York Theatre critic, Clyde Beagle, madly rushing to meet his deadline, surrounded by the fierce din of clacking typewriters. The play, You're a Good Man Charlie Brown, a definite success. The Beagle Award for outstanding performances were turned in by Cathy Wallace (Lucy) and Mary Ann McDonald (Patty).

SCHROEDER: I found it very...

LUCY: Fascinating
SCHROEDER: I liked...

LINUS:... the competent and, at times, highly creative staging and interpretational insights given this superficial text.

LINUS: For example, Patty, who walks in a daze across the stage and is stopped by Charlie Brown, recognizing her troubled condition. As Patty explains, "There I was jumping rope, and suddenly it all seemed so futile." The existential implications of ordinary playground activity are seen to...

SCHROEDER: It reminded me of...
SNOOPY: Supper! Supper! Supper! Behold the brimming bowl of meat and meal...

CHARLIE BROWN: Hold it! Why can't you eat your dinner like any normal dog. Why do you have to make a big production number out of it?

SNOOPY: I have medals for that number. It's a superb number! What's wrong with making mealtime a joyous occasion?

LINUS: Not only that, the rapport between the actors and the maintaining of character at all times added a dimension of reality and warmth to these, otherwise, cartoon figures.

SNOOPY: The weary theatre critic, still hammering away at his typewriter with broken and bloody paws, fighting to make the morning papers, and yet he knows he must continue. For there are highlights yet to be praised and the world must be told. The Act I finale, a book report on Peter Rabbit, reached a pinnacle of nostalgic delight...

CHARLIE BROWN, LUCY, LINUS, SCHROEDER: Homework. Oh no!

You're a Good Man Charlie Brown now at the Playhouse Theatre. If you're a fan of Charles Schulz you'll love it.

that age to "inferior", "uncivilized" peoples. The conservative Zionist wanted to get rid of them, the left Zionists to bring them the advantages of the 'white man's civilization.'

They made no effort to integrate their struggles with those of the Arabs against colonial administration. Rather, the Zionists proceeded publicly on the assumption that the land they sought was empty, and privately with the conviction that the indigenous population would have to be subjugated or removed.

To the extent that they tried to legitimize their presence in the Middle East, it was with the rulers, not with the people, that they dealt. They came very close to finalizing arrangements with both the Turks (Palestine was a part of the Ottoman Empire) and the Arabs (King Faisal, both of whom were somewhat sympathetic to the aims of the Zionists, and willing to accept a Jewish area in Palestine if they could obtain concessions to sweeten the deal.

With the establishment of the State of Israel, of course, came the formalization of inferior status for the Palestinian Arabs — large-scale denials of political and economic rights. And with each successive war, more and more Arabs have come under Israeli rule.

The result has been Arab fury at what they consider the implantation of an imperialist, oppressive, land-hungry state in their midst. The opposing claims of Arabs and Jew have seemed irreconcilable.

Rodinson disposes with some of the traditional Zionist justifications for their presence in the Middle East. The argument that the Jewish people had lived there some two thousand years before, he points out, is rather untenable: using such reasoning, the Arabs, for example, could lay claim to Spain. Nor was Palestine 'empty,' as is sometimes claimed in Zionist propaganda.

But Rodinson goes farther than those who merely reverse the values of the guilt-ridden West, and set up the Arabs as 'good guys', the Israelis as 'bad guys'.

He shows that, whatever the faults of Zionism (and he spends most of the book documenting them) the situation in the Middle East is the tragic product of two peoples brought into conflict by forces largely beyond their control.

The Arabs, for their part, wanted to end all foreign domination of their countries, and were unwilling to suffer oppression at the hand of European intruders, be they Turk, British or Jewish.

"The Jews, as should be too brutally obvious to even mention, were being persecuted and butchered beyond belief in Europe. No country in the world was willing to welcome them in large numbers as they sought to flee. Palestine was their only viable alternative. Only a moralistic blindness bred by the distance of years and miles, and fostered by ignorance of the experience of the Jewish people, could condemn them for seizing the option of Palestine, or for sharing the current attitudes of the entire white world.

Despite their record there, it is stupid to condemn the Jews for coming to Palestine. They had no choice. It is impossible to understand the situation without coming to grips with that fact, any more than it is possible to understand it while refusing to admit the oppressive nature of the present Israeli state.

But it's much, much easier to point at the causes of a problem than to find a solution. It's "clear", in a manner of speaking, that the Arab nations must recognize Israel's right to exist, that Israel must become a bi-national, not a Jewish state, that Israel cannot retain the territories it conquered in the Six Day War.

These points, however, are academic platitudes until profound social and political changes occur in both Israel and the Arab states. In this context, it's instructive to note that Rodinson's analysis first appeared in an essay in Jean-Paul Sartre's Les Temps Modernes in a special 1000-page issue on the Middle East, with contributions from Jewish and Arab leftists. It is significant and frightening that even among these socialists, united, supposedly by internationalism, humanitarianism, and class analysis, there was little common ground. A wide gulf separated the Arabs closest to being sympathetic to Israel from those Israelis farthest on the left. It is clear then when even these people cannot agree, there is little climate for reconciliation at present. Its creation will be a long process indeed.

In the meantime, it is painful to read the facile solutions of people far from the scene, who are quick to assign blame and offer blueprints to solve the problems, those who, in Rodinson's phrase, "preach vengeance and murder from ivory towers".

As long as an expansionist, oppressive, militaristic Israel confronts reactionary, repressive, militaristic Arab states that have yet to renounce even genocide, there is no solution, unless it be the newest version of the "final solution", that of driving Israelis "into the sea".

All that can be hoped for is a tolerable settlement of borders and provision for security arrangements until Arabs and Jews begin, and carry out, the long and arduous and long overdue process of setting their own houses in order.

Hamilton symphony is worth the drive

To those of us whose musical interests are broad in the geographical sense, the Hamilton Philharmonic's Series "A" concerts are certainly worth the forty minute drive. Hamilton has always studied this series with renowned soloists (the first concert featured Maureen Forrester, and among future soloists is hornist Barry Tuckwell); but now, blessed with the responsive acoustics of their recently finished concert hall, the orchestra is attracting more and more Torontonians on its own musical merits.

Last week's concert typically features a contemporary work (Strophes, by Welsh composer Paul Broome), a concerto (by Schumann), and a large orchestral show-piece, Mussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition.

Schumann's Piano Concerto was performed by Shura Cherkassky. I say performed, because this man, a one-time student of Joseph Hoffman and bearing a disturbing resemblance to Misha Elman, played the piece with a strongly personal approach. Mentioning the names of Hoffman and Elman is appropriate because this style of pianism is probably just as unfamiliar to the young concert-goer as those names are. Cherkassky played with at times embarrassing sentimentality reminiscent of Paderewski's classic piano rolls of Chopin waltzes - sweeping rubatos and rhapsodic tempo changes abounded.

However he brought out long lines and inner voices with the certain touch of a master. Cherkassky's pianism stems from the salad days of the keyboard, when every repetition of a "forte" phrase was inevitably "piano", and the concerto was the exclusive property of the soloist. And yet, these ideas of the past were not rendered with the frail whimsy of old age. In the finale, as the orchestra began to grow weary, Cherkassky's all-encompassing master plan became manifest. His tone grew richer and almost orchestral in depth, his pace more and more exciting until he brought the concerto not to mere conclusion, but climax.

After intermission, Boris Brott demonstrated his own brand of romanticism with the ultimate programme music, Mussorgsky's Pictures. This work calls for orchestral and conductorial virtuosity, endless rehearsal and a bit of luck. Most of the piece was excitingly successful, although the exact proportion of the above ingredients would be difficult to tell.

Coherence of the whole as obtained at the cost of inappropriately brisk tempos. This was most obvious in "The Old Castle" and "Bydlo" which galloped along at a speed wholly impossible for a huge, ponderous lumbering Polish oxcart. The woodwinds were at times fuzzy in articulation, overlapping their phrases into rests (perhaps it was the sonority of the hall); thus the precious fragility of the "Dance of the Unhatched Chicks in their Shells" was obtunded. At the best of moments, massive orchestral effects were in abundance, although internal contrasts were not always outlined with the precision that one would have expected. To say that is to admit to high standards, and at their well-rehearsed best, the Hamilton Philharmonic inspires the listener to set his standards at an international level.

Virtuosi play gloriously

In baroque chamber orchestral music, excellence is defined by the name "Virtuosi di Roma". They have played countless concerts (a friend of mine has been loyal in their audience for 25 years), recorded reams of repertoire both standard and esoteric, and inspired dozens of similar orchestras around the world, including our own Toronto Chamber Players.

So to discuss Monday night's Massey Hall performance within any other frame of reference but that of the group itself, is impossible. They played, as gloriously as ever, concert by Vivaldi and Corelli. This music seems to be exactly suited for the Italian temperament; it is sunny and lyrical and the occasional stormy squall usually turns out to be a tempest in a teacup.

The "Virtuosi" played works which were mostly familiar, including Corelli's Concerto Grosso No. 8, (the Christmas Concerto), in a revision by the group's conductor and guiding spirit, Renato Fasano. Soloist Renato Zanfini played beautifully a rather trivial oboe concerto of Vivaldi, and the concert concluded with Vivaldi's "The Seasons". I've never heard this set of four concerti—surely the most familiar work of its kind—played with such delicacy, technical wizardry and affection.

Skip Prokop brought his tribe of musical gypsies back into the friendly confines of hometown emporium Massey Hall last Friday night, and the enthusiasm of the audience was suitably duplicated on stage by Skip and the other ten members of Lighthouse. While Skip and company seem to have been partly caught up in the flair for finery which is growing out of the popularity of art-rock, the music of Lighthouse, solid, gutsy, with more emphasis on vocal proficiency, has suffered from no such embellishments. Prokop looked like a vision out of the reign of the French Sun King, or a modern-day Dardan, resplendent in a green silk outfit complete with black cowboy hat.

He surprised not a few old fans by arming himself with a Rickenbacker guitar and forsaking the friendly protection of his drum kit to virtually lead, vocally and by his bubbly presence, Lighthouse through spirited performances on "1849", "Take It Easy" and a song for all the pretty ladies in Toronto—the current chart-rider for the group "Pretty Lady".

Much criticism has been levelled at the group of late because of the absence of lead-singer Bob McBride, now doing a solo gig, and the retirement of musical coordinator Paul Hoffert, but the slack seems to have been adequately taken by all of the members of Lighthouse, and particularly by Prokop and lead guitarist Ralph Cole. Lighthouse appears to have weathered the transitional period in their development, and their inroads into American markets can only spell further success for this talented, fun-loving Canadian powerhouse in the jazz-rock domain.

And that's the truth!

Maria Muldaur: someone's wife makes good on her own

When Geoff Muldaur joined Paul Butterfield's 'Better Days', I wondered in a vague way what had happened to his wife, Maria. Had she (perish the thought) dropped out of music?

Then, in June, I saw an ad in 'The Village Voice' advertising that Maria Muldaur would be appearing at the Metro in New York, and that she was now a Solo artist on Warner Bros., with a new album out soon. The album is here, and while in some ways a disappointment, it is good that she is back. Beyond that, she is beginning to get the attention she has deserved for a long time.

Back in 1965, Maria, then Maria D'Amato, joined up with the Jim Kweskin Jug Band, where she met Geoff and banjo and steel guitar player Bill Keith, and violinist Richard Greene. On any given Jug Band album, the cuts on which Maria sang were generally the highlights songs like 'I'm a Woman', 'Richlan' Woman', 'When I Was a Cowboy'. She also played a mean kazoo, and, occasionally, fiddle.

With the disbanding of the Jug Band she recorded two excellent albums with Geoff, 'Pottery Pie', and 'Sweet Potatoes'. Unfortunately, neither sold a damn, and the second was not even released in Canada.

Now we have Maria Muldaur on her own. Obviously Warner Brothers spared no expense to try and make her a star, surrounding her with at least 30 background musicians, only three of whom have recorded with her before, Amos Garrett, Bill Keith, and Richard Greene, and many of whom are among the best-known session musicians around, including Dr. John, Jim Keltner, Chris Ethridge, Ry Cooder, and the late Clarence White. The result, unfortunately, was as one would have expected. The approach to the songs is often production-line, particularly a number like 'Three Dollar Bill', arranged by Dr. John, who is spreading himself awfully thin.

Where a given musician only appears on one, or two or three cuts at most, the listener has little opportunity to recognize an individual style. Even so, there are moments—Ry Cooder's acoustic guitar on 'Any Old Time', Amos Garrett's very fluid electric guitar, reminiscent of Les Paul (which gives an idea of Garrett's eccentric approach, in the rock world), on 'Midnight at the Oasis', and Bill Keith's steel guitar on 'Long Hard Climb'. Bill Keith is a musician to watch, who manages a depth on steel guitar which better-known players on the instrument, like Sneaky Pete, or even Pete Drake, can't approach.

With all the names listed on the credits to this album, there is one that is missing, and whose absence is felt Geoff Muldaur. On 'Pottery Pie' and 'Sweet Potatoes', Muldaur's brilliance as an arranger, and his consummate taste, reflected in his choice of songs, made those albums a joy. On the present album, most of the songs are better than average, but not memorable. Only a few like 'Don't You Feel My Leg' 'Any Old Time' and 'The Work Song' have that combination of arresting words and melody which stick in the mind. Several others come close, notably Wendy Waldman's 'Mad Mad Me', which starts out with some slow piano chords in the manner of Laura Nyro or Randy Newman, and features exquisitely sad strings by Larry Packer. A defect in most of the songs is lyrics, enough to make one wish for the old practice of melody and lyrics being handled by two people. If the guy who wrote the tune can't put words together, there's no reason why not. One song, 'I Never Did Sing You a Love Song', remains incomprehensible after three listenings.

Each stanza contradicts the one before.

Much of the album is over-produced, due to the ministrations of not one but two well known producers, Lenny Waronker and Joe Boyd.

Despite all the objections, it must be said that this is a very pleasant album, one of the better current releases. Maria herself comes through fairly well. Previously, I had never heard her on more than three or four cuts per album, and I had misgivings at first whether hearing her every track would be too much. I still am not entirely sure if she should be a solo artist. The other major problem, lack of power in her voice, which is a bit reedy, with a strange coaxing quality to it, she has overcome and more, revealing considerable power when needed.

To someone who wanted to hear Maria Muldaur in an ideal setting, I would suggest: get hold of 'Sweet Potatoes' (order through Round Records is one way). Amos Garrett and Bill Keith are all over it. The cuts include Chuck Berry's 'Havana Moon', 'Dardanelle', Hoagy Carmichael's 'Lazybones' and a classic, 'Lover Man, Where Can You Be?' (sung by Maria).

MBA

Co-op
Full-time
Part-time

McMaster University now has a third option for students interested in proceeding to a Master of Business Administration degree: a co-operative option, whereby students alternate four-month periods of study and relevant work experience. A limited number of applications will be accepted for the semester beginning in September, 1974.

CO-OP

An MBA degree from McMaster could help you to achieve your career objectives in the areas of management, administration, and education because the McMaster MBA program offers a wide range of optional courses (that can be selected to your needs) as well as providing a core of basic knowledge and skills. Although admission is restricted to those who have proven that they have the potential and commitment required to complete a demanding program, graduates in any discipline may be accepted.

Academic standing is not the only entry criterion but, as a general rule, you can have a reasonable expectation of completing the McMaster MBA program if you have maintained at least a second-class standing in the last two years of your undergraduate program and if you can achieve a satisfactory test score in the Admission Test for Graduate Study in Business.

PART-TIME

Applicants for the McMaster MBA who have taken relevant course work may be granted advanced standing in our program. If you are interested in exploring this challenging opportunity further, fill in and mail this form.

Can the man who wrote
"Weasels ripped my flesh" and "Willie the Pimp" be a hardworking musician who likes Stravinsky?

By ALLAN MANDELL

What would you expect going to meet Frank Zappa?

This is a man who's put over a dozen albums with such titles as, Burnt Weenie Sandwich, Hot Rats, Chunga's Revenge and Lumpy Gravy, and is generally regarded as one of the freakiest phenomena in music.

I think I expected magic or at least craziness.

I found neither.

Entering the hotel room, (pretty posh — The Windsor Arms) I encountered a real human Frank Zappa already being interviewed. So I sat and waited my turn listening attentively to what was going on.

This wasn't just a hotel room you understand but a suite, and we were sitting in the living room portion. There were about two dozen cassettes, lying around on the tables. Each one bore the name of a city. As it turned out Zappa records all his concerts. What I saw were the stereo cassettes, but he also simultaneously records everything quadrophonically. The band listens to each tape after a performance to catch any mistakes or see what improvements can be made. This is no haphazard musician.

The other interviewer finished, and Zappa put on a tape of the previous night's concert in Waterloo. For almost 10 minutes we were treated to the midthe movement of a song that merged two very different musical styles, "The Bebop Tango".

And then... yes, and then, I interviewed Mr. Zappa.

What I found was a very opinionated, very frank (no pun intended) individual who is truly involved in his music. The general public doesn't understand that seeming 'freakiness' is just an outgrowth of his approach to life.

"My philosophy is, there's no reason why you can't play any music you want to play, any time you want, or do anything you want on stage. I believe in that kind of freedom of expression."

Zappa is a serious musician. He writes all the music for the Mothers. With "very little classical training" he scores all the parts for whatever medium he's writing in, be it a full orchestra, a brass quartet or a six-piece rock band. His own musical preferences tend towards the contemporary orchestral sounds of people like Penderecki, Varese and Stravinsky.

It's easy to see that Zappa's main concern these days is his music.

"In the early days I kept a bunch of people in the group 'cause I liked them and because they had good spirit in spite of the fact that they weren't great musicians. Jimmy Carl Black's one of them. He's not the greatest drummer that ever happened but missing out. To me, the studio is a useful tool. It's a great place to do certain experimental things. There are a number of things that are feasible in the studio that are impossible on a stage, like overdubbing. But for getting out and 'doing it' you've got to go on the road."

Once the band has adjusted itself to touring, "everybody is really interested in jumping out on that stage and just 'doing it' to an audience, just surprising the living shit out of them by doing things that are theoretically impossible."

Zappa's discussion of his song "the Bebop Tango" give you some insight into the way in which he constructs his music.

"You have a melody that first of all is technically difficult to play on any instrument. It's the hardest twisted bunch of notes you ever saw on paper. First of all everyone had to memorize it, then they had to get to play it that fast. If you ever saw it on paper, I'm telling you, it would look like a bunch of ants had run across the thing. It's ridiculous. Then after they memorized it and learned to play it that fast they have to make fun of it along with me on behalf of the audience who couldn't hear it anyway — they just don't know how hard it is to even play that tune. Then after we've joked around with it, George (Duke) is sitting there playing it, and singing it and breaking it up and tossing it around in between what I'm saying. That's some fancy shit."

"Knowledge is structured in consciousness. Let it expand through T.M."

he had a great spirit and he added a lot to the group. Don Preston used to make mistakes all the time in his parts but he also has one of those personalities that was just so right for the band.

"But I don't like to maintain that attitude anymore, I've been doing this for so long, I've been waiting for so long to get the right notes played everytime, that I'm looking for people that not only have the right spirit, but get up there and do it — really play the notes."

Because he is concerned with giving accurate performances he says he would never have former Mothers in the group again. Commenting about his recently-departed lead singers, Howard Kaylan and Mark Volman,

"They didn't always give accurate performances in terms of the notes that they sang. Howard was better about it than Mark, but Mark had a tendency to extra-curricular excess which ruined his voice and made it impossible for him to negotiate the parts. After a while the only thing that he was good for on stage was juggling a tambourine, being fat and making people laugh occasionally. But when it came down to actually singing the notes, he was takin' it and Howard had to carry him. Howard has a great strong voice... a stronger physique too, because he would carouse as much as everybody else but he would be more on the ball when it came time to get back on stage."

Zappa and the Mothers have already performed in Toronto twice this year. In fact, they've completed over 100 concerts since January. Most bands dislike touring but Zappa feels different.

"I had to choose I'd be touring."

"I like to have something happening where the music is alive, and there's people in it, and some feeling to it. It's so hard to get something that exciting in a studio. I think that anyone that wants to shut himself up in a studio for the rest of his life is

"It takes a lot of work to do that and it takes some really good people too."

"I wrote it about a year and a half ago. It was originally written as a trumpet solo for a guy named Malcom McNabe. It took him three months of constant practise before he could play it. And he can't play it that fast. He can play it maybe half that speed. And he is a fantastic trumpet player who's worked with the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and does recordings and concerts — he busted his chops to learn to play it. That piece has been played by three different sorts of Mother and each time it's been played it's undergone changes."

About a year and a half ago Zappa released a full length feature movie and an accompanying soundtrack album called "200 Motels".

"Some of it was successful and some of it wasn't. I think the main thing that held it back was a small budget, because there wasn't enough money to give us enough time to do things perfectly."

"That film was shot in 56 hours, seven eight-hour days exactly."

"I didn't like the way that the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra played my music. Most of it is very inaccurate... it was a combination of not enough respect (for the music) and not enough rehearsal time. If you took a piece like 'I'm Stealing the Room'. If you ever saw it on paper it's a complex score, it's not a joke, it's a hard score and conservative estimates of the length of time it would take an orchestra to play it right have run up to a year of rehearsal. They had that plus about 10 other hard pieces to do in front of the camera with maybe 10 hours of rehearsal."

"Then on the other hand who in his right mind is gonna want to spend enough money to get those pieces played right because after they're played right who wants to listen to them?"

"See, it's sort of a dilemma folks!"

Hart House is paying dubious tribute to the memory of a forgotten artist by having a retrospective show of his works. Burtram Brooker's (1888-1955) tea-and-crumpt-naturalism is as bad as his country-club-cubism. A mushy show all-round.

Two print shows on campus: an exhibition of wood-engraving by G. Brender & Brandis (Imposing name, eh?) running through December 7 and an exhibition of prints by Marvin Swartz which includes descriptions to some of the major print-making media and techniques and is slated to run December 3.

If you get a chance, drop in at the Varsarely show at the Albert White Gallery. Varsarely is the classiest of the minimalists. His cold metallic paintings, which give the illusion of depth and of reflected light, are avidly sought after to dignify offices in cold metallic skyscrapers. One senses, however, looking at the body of his work, a core of new and independent discovery that places him (precariously though) above his market.

rock

This is a busy week, musically speaking. At Fiddler's Green tonight is a British traditional singer who now lives in the US, Cliff Hisslam. Contemporary songs, by Fred Booker are featured on Tuesday. Call 489-3001 for information. Admission is $1.

Humourist, Biff Rose, is at the Riverboat (922-6216) tonight and tomorrow. The good-time sound of the Good Brothers take over on Tuesday. The cover charge is $3.50.

An event billed as the "Spirit of '37 Festival" is being presented tomorrow at 8:30 pm, at the OCE auditorium on Bloor Street. The patriotic music and poetry of Milton Acorn and Cedric Smith (of Perth County Conspiracy) will be featured. The festival is being sponsored by something called "the anti-Imperialist day committee" which, in reality, is just a front for the CLM (for all you politicians). Tickets are $2 in advance and $2.50 at the door. Call 964-1139.

A Concise History of Canadian Painting Dennis Reid

Oxford University Press, $9.50 cloth, $5.50 paper

Dennis Reid's survey has much to recommend it as an introduction to Canadian art.

The development of painting in Canada is skillfully traced from its origins in Quebec to the present day in a style which is both lucid and readable.

Reid begins his survey in New France, with paintings which are at best tenuously Canadian and then expands his scope to British North America before launching into a discussion of nineteenth century painters and their work.

The Group of Seven, according to Reid "defined" Canadian art in their

The one and only Frank Zappa and the Mothers are in town to 'do it' to you in the friendly confines of Massey Hall tonight. There will be two shows, at 8 and 11 pm. This is not a tour to plug a new AM single. If you're interested, their latest album is called "Overnight Sensation" (WEA). Tickets are $4 to $6 plus tax.

Mackenzie's Corner House is a tavern in the style of those places that have low ceilings, and walls done up in super graphics and splashes of colour. Lately they've been getting into the entertainment business in a big way, bringing in names like Jerry Jeff and Ian Tyson. This week they've got the Edwin Hawkins Singers, (who sang "Oh Happy Days" a few years back). The cover charge is $2 or free. The much heralded guitarist Roy Buchanan will be featured Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday only. Call 922-6954.

Next week should keep blues fans pretty occupied. Buddy Guy and Junior Wells are at the El Mocambo (961-2558) while Muddy Waters opens at the Colonial (363-6168).

Former member of Andy Warhol's Velvet Underground, Lou Reed, returns to Massey Hall on Thursday. Reed's last concert here was widely criticized as a shoddy performance. This time the glamour boy of glitter rock promises quadrophonic sound and something called the "Berlin Show" which no-doubt refers to his latest album "Berlin" (RCA). Tickets are $5 to $6.

The dailies seem to go heavily on the more standard aspects of classical music presentation in this burg, so here's an outline of where to look for the different shows, the ones Litter and Kraglund never seem to write about.

The Edward Johnson Building, as regular readers of this column will know, runs more music than all the other performing groups in the city put together. Between student recitals and concerts by internationally known artists, the EJB manages to put forth a consistently good level of music. Typical of the stuff that is presented is Sunday's performance by the U of T Symphony Orchestra at 8:30 pm. The Orchestra has been a source of interest on campus for many years, and tomorrow's soloists may well be playing away right now.

work". The final chapters of the book provide an interesting guide to recent and contemporary art. The last, entitled "a continuing tradition" chooses 1965 as the cut off point, although the author feels that those artists under discussion are just reaching their maturity now.

One of the pleasant features of the author's approach is his ability to sketch in the background by correlating the paintings, characters and historical events. He does this clearly and unobtrusively.

Although a thoroughly pleasant work from the viewpoint of the general reader, Dennis Reid's "A Concise History of Canadian Painting" is the type of work which could become a standard textbook for serious art students.

The crisp format and the reasonable price might well make this inevitable.

That concert is free, as is Thursday's lecture on "Live Electronic Music at Fylkingen", 2:10 pm in the concert hall.

Searching for the offbeat can be interesting, too. Recently, a concert of the Budapest Philharmonic took place at Convocation Hall, and hardly anyone knew about it. Hart House sports many a concert in its timetable, yet few people know about them. Whether this is because of poor advertising or lack of audience interest is open to question, but more people should be getting out for the concerts. For example, the New Chamber Orchestra of Canada, a truly fine ensemble (whose last concert was sold out) have their next show at Hart House in mid-December. Even though this is after school's over for the term, make a note of it.

News on the vinyl shortage: reliable sources have it that record companies may be melting down old, unsaleable stock for re-pressing into new discs. Vinyl, an eminently re-cyclable material could be as good as gold until the oil crisis is over. We may even see a system of deposits and refunds on discs, a sort of rental. Bring 'em back like Coke bottles for a new disc in return, or something like that.

Any feedback on my "How to buy Hi-Fi piece of last week?" I'd be interested to hear from anyone who has a tale to tell of buying electronic gear in Toronto. News of thieving mongrels in rip-off shops or saints in discount outlets is what I'm after.

Well here we go again with a pre-Christmas grab-bag of theatrical goodies. It's hard to keep up but suddenly there's something for everybody. In a brief rundown of what's already showing: Strindberg's Miss Julie, done by the Academy of Theatre Arts experimental study group, is at the Ward-Price Building 23 Grenville St. and Strindberg's The Dance of Death is playing at the St. Lawrence Centre. Bigger Than Both of Us, a Bogart-indebted newspaper spoof, continues at the Global Village and The Group of Seven and The Case of the Glowing Pine, a fun Canadian satire, has begun an indefinite run at the Poor Alex. They have two shows on weekends at 7:30 and 10:00 with student rush tickets at $2.00. You're a Good Man Charlie Brown, at the Playhouse Theatre, is only jaded and dated if you are. (Snoopy is really first-rate). Hart House Theatre's Sticks and Bones lives up to the honour of its Canadian premiere and can still be seen tonight and tomorrow night at 8:30. Student tickets are $1.50.

The Toronto Truck Theatre opened a Wood Allen comedy Don't Drink The Water this week at the Colonnade Theatre. It is the story of a naive New Jersey caterer and his family who, vacationing behind the Iron curtain, are chased into the American Embassy for taking illegal snapshots. The subsequent mix-ups include spy-trading, international intrigue and general hilarity. For other new shows see the Review section there are even more. Opening tonight at Theatre Passe Muraille is Larry Fineberg's new play All The Ghosts and the Tarragon launches James Reaney's Sticks and Stones: The Donnelly Part One on Saturday night. There's still more but you'll have to find it yourself or check next week's Whatsup. But on campus next week the Studio Theatre (4 Glen Morris) presents a new original work by Debby Nathan and Edward Bean called Performance Of Our Lives. It deals with a houseful of people who discover the necessity of adopting disguises in order to face the world in which they live. Performances run November 28 - December 1 at 8:30 pm. Admission is free but call the Theatre at 928-8705 for reservations.

If anyone went to riverrun at St. Mike's last week because it was mentioned here all we can say is Jesus, we're sorry. We do try to distinguish between movies we like and movies we want to see.

Clearly the recommendations in this space have to be taken with grains of salt. There are maybe ten movies showing a night at various repertory programmes, of which we hear about maybe half. Of those we've seen maybe another half. Then, a little too often for comfort, the programme changes after we get the information. Always phone first.

The following are some of the purveyors of cheap, often good movies:
SAC Film Society (Friday nights) 928-4911.

St. Mike's Film Society (Friday through Sunday nights).

O.I.S.E. (Wednesdays and Thursdays). The Roxy 481-2401.

Kensington 532-7774.

Cinematuliere 920-9817.

College Cinema 964-7111.

Cinemetek 487-9714.

Ontario Science Centre (Tuesdays through Thursdays).

plus the museum, art gallery, and various libraries.

Among the fare this week: Quebec filmmaker Gilles Carle's Death of a Lumberjack opens a several week run at Cinematuliere tonight.

Tonight and tomorrow, at the Kensington, it's a trendy double-bill of Performance and A Clockwork Orange. I would like to show Orange and issue everyone Paulene Kel's review, one of her best, which ended, "When are people going to stop talking about the dazzling brilliance of the movies and start noticing that the directors are sucking up to the thugs in the audience?" On Sunday at 2:30 Cinematuliere is housing a benefit showing of The Organizer with proceeds going to the Artistic Woodworkers strike.

And, without further ado, I Even Met Happy Gipsies is double-billed with Mar-Joe Monday to Wednesday at the Kensington. One down and one to go.

Tracking through the snow

By IGOR KGB ROMANOVITCH

Freshly-fallen snow in northern Ontario brought hopes this weekend for Sasquatch hunters that the elusive creature might be located and captured to collect the $100,000 reward posted by book publishers McClelland and Stewart for a live Sasquatch.

But provincial police reported that blowing winds over the weekend would probably cover any tracks left by the famous being sometimes described as Canada's answer to the abominable snowman.

The reward was posted last week by McClelland and Stewart whose spokesmen said it would only be paid to a Canadian citizen willing to sign over movie rights.

Snowmobile shops said they were unable to say whether last weekend's increase in sales was due to new snow or Sasquatch hunters. However one dealer said that it was unlikely to be from Sasquatch hunters.

"I used to get the odd sale every now and then when I had my shop in British Columbia," he said. "But I really doubt if there's any here in Ontario. Too much pollution — Sasquatches don't like pollution, you know."

Meanwhile, the Ontario Sasquatch League is calling a general membership meeting tonight to decide if the organization should protest the reward offer.

The "Great Mother" rises

Paintings of the female genitalia and sculptures of women's "feminine areas" highlighted a lecture on the ancient cave-man's variety of the feminine mystique.

Using a slide show to illustrate her points, York professor Johanna Stuckey, told a Wednesday audience pre-history artifacts found in Austria and Russia were female whose nature was "fertility."

The extremities of these female statues were apparently unimportant, and the "feminine" areas of the body (hips, breasts, abdomen) were "accentuated." The speaker concluded the statues were artistic representations of the "Great Mother" myth.

From an early neolithic culture Stuckey described caves in which paintings were found as "naturally" looking like "female genitalia." The walls of the caves were "covered with phallic symbols." Women's bodies occur quite often in the paintings but not profusely, because the "caves themselves are feminine."

There are no male statues found in the artifacts of this period. In the paintings men are portrayed as "little stick figures," not by "naturalistic" representations.

Regarding males and females in the art Stuckey commented: "You don't find one without the other, but you don't find the male figure, in totality."

Ancestors of the present-day Sasquatch left these enigmatic sculptures of long-forgotten tenured U of T professors in northern wastelands.

The speaker asserted the earliest cult of the "Great Mother" goddess presented her as a "unified goddess, both womb and tomb." She was the "earth" who "gave life and took it away."

As women were involved in the "passive reproduction" of the race, it appears that men regarded them as having "incredible, irresistible power."

As man possessed no natural "force greater than woman's," physical force had to be used to subdue her.

As societies became "more organized," the "Great Mother" goddess was "divided up." The breakdown was tripartite: woman the mother, who received any authority she had from her role of passive reproduction; woman the "witch" who dealt with death and the underworld; and her twin woman the "sexual temptress."

The latter was the only goddess of the later, Babylonian period with any amount of power.

Stuckey suggested that a contemporary study of her as "bitch goddess" is in Norman Mailer's American Dream.

Women win hockey, badminton section

In women's sports the Blues badminton team easily won the eastern sectional tournament at York University. Out of a possible 27 points, the results were: 1. Toronto 25; 2. Queen's 15; 3. York 10; 4. Otaawa 4.

In basketball they dropped their opener 42-27 to Laurentian.

Wednesday night saw the intercollegiate ice hockey team defeat McMaster 7-2. Toronto took an early three goal lead on shots by Allison McGeer, Angie Colm, and Maureen Mitchell.

A short-handed goal by Lynda Harley and another marker by Anna Radecki gave the Blues a 5-0 lead at the end of the first period.

The second period saw straggle play by both teams. Mac was able to pick up two goals, one on the power play, even though Toronto outshot them 10-3.

In the freewheeling final period the Blues came up with the crisp passing game which led them to their previous victories. Goals by Cathy Stead and Lynda Harley rounded out the scoring and sharp defence by Jan Mackay and Nancy Missouri, provided great protection for goalie Judy Reeves.

In exhibition basketball the men's Blues are still suffering their rookie woes as coach John McManus puts together a relatively inexperienced squad. Wednesday night it was the Guelph Gryphons who dumped them. Saturday they go against Carleton in the Benson Building at 2 pm.

This year Laurentian has started off as the early leader, followed by a surprise Ryerson team. The Rams two wins are more than their two-year OUAA total previously.

In interfac basketball there could be some interesting individual battles shaping up this season. Intercollegiate ball players are prominent this year on several first division rosters.

Doubtless the best known is Dave Watt for Vic, Blues' leading scorer last year, and fifth best in the league. He quit to devote his serious training to making the Olympic triple jump standards.

Joining him is Mike Eben, former Omega trophy winner in 1967 with the Blues' football team and CFL pro. Neither has looked sharp thus far, but the league has only started.

Larry Trafford has been playing for St.Mikes and before that the Blues, and refereeing almost as long as Paul Carson. He's back again this year.

The Graduate team in last year's interfac narrowly missed the play-offs in the final game. This year they have added an American whose name is variously reported as Fjeld and Fjord and who played four years of American college ball.

His first two outings netted him 29 and 28, in wins over Trinity and UC. Blues' coach McManus sounded covetous when mention of Grads came up during a practice session.

Trinity has returned to the big first this year after several seasons in the second. Although SGS had a field day against them in the opener, they will be a tough team to beat, with big Dan Foster from the Blues and Dave Wright from Queen's shooting for them. In addition, they have almost all of their team back from their 72-73 second division title win.

The Hookers refused to take it lying down from the Dodgers in the second game of the touch football finals as they bobbed back for a 14-12 decision.

Sinukoff choked up one major and Shute fired through for the other, with Romanowicz and Waller catching converts to give the Hookers all their scoring in the first half.

For the Dodgers Sternberg scored an unconverted TD in the first half, matched by Herman in the second. The lack of converts proved to be the margin for the winners, forcing a third game next Tuesday.

Early scoring statistics from

Hookers touch Dodgers 14-12

Too little dodging and too much hooking in touch football final let Hookers tie series 1-1. Dodgers get another chance to lay them in the dust (snow?) in Tuesday's deciding game.

OUAA hockey tell an interesting story. In spite of Blues' 8-4 victory over York, Yeomen dominate individual scoring records so far (with the Ryerson game unlisted yet).

rookie goalie. This year's team, while lacking some of the explosive scoring of recent years, is more balanced, and very strong defensively.

Next Wednesday they play an exhibition against Waterloo at Varsity Arena at 8 pm. The Warriors have long been one of Blues' few rivals, and they have a powerful squad again, led by their high-scoring line of Mike Guimond, Russ Elliot and Ron Hawkshaw, and former Junior A defenceman Cam Crosby.

Forster report followed in new budget

By BOB GAUTHIER

While the Governing Council's Academic Affairs Committee goes through the motions of discussion, approval, or amendment of the academic appointments task force report, some of the report's recommendations are apparently already being subtly followed as indicated by the confidential budget committee report leaked on Thursday.

The budget committee's 1974-75 "general recommendations" indicate that many of the matters discussed in the Forster task force on academic appointments are being carried out through the financial administration of the university.

Vice-president and provost Don Forster chairs the budget committee, sits on the task force and is responsible for much of the academic decisions at this university.

Anticipating the approval of the Forster task force recommendations, the budget committee recommends: "That during the 1974-75 fiscal year no increases in staff likely to involve the university in a commitment to full-time continuing academic salaries to be made in any part of the university, unless very strong reasons exist for making an exception."

The committee's report continues: "We repeat our recommendation of last year that every vacancy in the academic staff establishment that occurs from resignation, retirement, death, or any other cause, at the beginning of or during the course of 1974-75 and henceforth, be removed from the budget of the department or college or faculty concerned; "That the appropriate total or residual salary revert from the departmental budget to a central fund in the Office of the Vice-President and provost (Forster); "And that the Vice-president and provost be empowered either to direct such sums to different areas of the university, to withhold them and let them revert to general academic underspending, or to re-create a position in the department where the vacancy occurred; subject to evidence being presented of need and exhaustion of other alternatives."

By comparison, one of the terms of reference of the Forster task force "the need to preserve flexibility to adapt to our programs and staff resources to changing academic requirements."

The budget committee's recommendation would appear to wet the groundwork for such "flexibility" by cutting down on expenditure with the university approaching a 'steady state' of enrolment and income) for the university's most costly expenditure — people.

The task force report states at one point: "We are persuaded that, over the next 10-year period and beyond, there will be a fairly steady and significant number of vacancies created by those members of the teaching staff who reach normal retirement age.

"We believe . . . that turnover rates and flexibility achieved by retirement can and should be increased marginally through the introduction of a more flexible and generous early retirement provision in the current pension plan."

Coincidentally, the budget committee recommends that, if underspending in the 1974-75 budget should occur, the top priority item becomes $400,000 for "past service pension liability".

However, the task force report released in August, rejected "the imposition of any limits on the size of the academic staff establishment by rank, by tenure status, by department or by division."

It concluded that "a great deal more information on divisional and departmental workloads and responsibilities would have to be made available . . . before sensible recommendations could be made in this area." In the meantime power of appointment rests in Forster's hands.

The budget committee also "believes that close co-operation in all aspects of appointments policy is particularly important in the arts and science area, the Faculty of Arts and Science, University College, Scarborough College and Erindale College."

The committee recommends that "all division heads and department chairmen, before seeking approval for an increase in staff or for the filling of a vacant position should be asked to explore fully the possibility of using staff resources already available in other divisions of the university."

This overall tone expressed by the budget committee is indicated by the task force's implications of cutbacks. The task force report even goes so far (the majority report, anyway) to say that it might be necessary to reduce staff because of "over-staffing or because an academic unit was being phased out or abolished."

The task force report indicates, however, that termination of an academic contract "must take place only after all other possibilities have been fully explored and found not to be feasible or sufficient." The budget committee recommends using "staff resources from other university divisions."

And, in an attempt to stop some divisions from "exporting" budget reductions, the budget committee has recommended that requests for cancellation of cross-appointment arrangements with other divisions be approved by Forster's office.

The budget committee found that cancellation of cross-appointment arrangements have "not often been necessary financially nor has it been warranted in terms of the academic health of the university's programs."

In making its recommendations the budget committee seems to be following the "spirit" of the Forster task force recommendations.

But the committee also seems to be aware of the necessity to steer a wide berth around the task force recommendations, apparently recognizing the need for further divisional study and appraisal.

Grape boycotters turn away customers at Dominion

By TIM GALLAGHER

Despite a heavy downpour Saturday, pickets supporting the United Farm Workers' (UFW) grape boycott managed to turn away customers from Metro-area Dominion stores.

The UFW has been boycotting Dominion stores since November 10 because they continue to sell non-union grapes and lettuce imported from California and Arizona.

By boycotting Dominion, the largest food chain in Toronto, the UFW hopes to force it and other chains into removing the grapes from their shelves.

Lupe Gamboa, a farmworker, said Dominion has been the most uncooperative. "They won't even talk with us," he added.

He mentioned most other stores have placed signs above their lettuce and grapes notifying shoppers that they shouldn't buy these products if they support the boycott.

As a result of Dominion's refusal to do likewise, 23 of its stores in Toronto are being picketed on weekends, with "up to 300 pickets involved," said Gamboa.

Singled out for special attention has been the Dominion store on Bloor just west of Spadina, near U of T and used by many students.

A week ago, several clergymen approached its manager, E. Poirier, and asked the grapes in his store be removed. Poirier complied but as soon as the pickets in front of his store left, he ordered the grapes placed back on the shelf.

Previously, Poirier was hostile to pickets calling them "pigs and creeps" according to Gamboa.

Gamboa said "We are going to picket this store every day . . . The others we only picket on weekends."

When approached by The Varsity, Poirier was quite belligerent. He said a sign notifying shoppers of the boycott had been placed over the grapes.

As for the lettuce, he said "They're (UFW) trying to remove the grapes. The grapes are the main concern . . . the lettuce is nothing."

Then he claimed the lettuce was from Arizona and this lettuce was not included in the boycott.

Pickets agreed the sign over the grapes was likely a manoeuvre to get them to leave. Also it was felt this was an indication of the boycott's success.

Several people were turned away from the store within half an hour when a Varsity reporter was present.

Meanwhile, back at City Hall, following a recommendation by Ward 6 Alderman Dan Heap, the executive committee of City Council has instructed the caterer for city hall's cafeteria not to sell California grapes.

Heap claimed the cafeteria, which is catered by a subsidiary of General Foods, was selling non-union California grapes.

The executive committee, in accordance with council's decision to support the California grape boycott, ordered the removal of the grapes.

Canterbury Grenadier which caters city hall sells only California lettuce, according to their manager at city hall.

He said: "The only lettuce which is in Canada at the present time is from either California or Arizona."

He went on to say "We need lettuce . . . there is nothing we can do." He said there was only one crate of grapes sold at City Hall and these "were union picked."

Stoplight to move north, Metro says

Metro Transportation Committee has decided to change the location of the Queen's Park Crescent stoplight that spelled bad news for racing fans a month ago, but it won't be installed until next year.

After years of dodging cars, trucks and buses, the City-U of T Liaison Committee recommended in October to the city that a traffic light be placed at the corner of Hoskin Avenue and the Crescent to break up the constant traffic flow.

According to Ward 6 Alderman Bill Archer, the transportation committee will recommend to Metro Council today that the traffic light be installed further north before the curve in the crescent, close to the law library.

The new location would avoid a back-up of traffic that would probable have occurred under the old plan.

The decision is the first concrete proposal the liaison committee has arrived at. The committee has been noted for its infrequent meetings and its verbosity. A survey earlier this fall showed that not many members could name their fellow-fellow-members on the committee.

According to the transportation report, the old proposal would not facilitate traffic flow in the area but would make traffic accidents more likely, especially with cars coming from the east part of the Crescent to meet the southbound traffic in hopes of turning west on Hoskin. Police reports say that this "weaving movement of traffic originating from the east Crescent" has caused 21 accidents since 1971.

"Traffic signals at Queen's Park Crescent West and Hoskin Avenue would aggravate the accident potential by making it more difficult for the westbound traffic to enter Hoskin Avenue in view of the queues which may be present at the signals."

The report says that the new crossing signals "might accentuate the platooning effect", that is, might break up the traffic flow, making it easier for students further south to cross at either Hoskin or at Hart House.

Although discussion on the subject included submissions from the student unions of both St. Michael's and Victoria Colleges, and a representation that included a Vic student who had been injured crossing Queen's Park Crescent, the recommendation seems to have been built more around traffic than safety considerations.

The report does state that "some improvement in the safe crossing opportunities may result at Queen's Park Crescent West and Hoskin Avenue as well."

Since the center of gravity on the campus has shifted west, students have been required to cross the Crescent more often, which led to the concern of the past few years, and fostered various recommendations to solve the problem.

In a burst of humor this summer, liaison committee member Alderman Dan Heap sent a letter to SAC with recommendations he did not endorse, which included felling trees in Queen's Park to build a bridge, strapping rope bridges from the trees, or overturning doubledecker buses in the crossing.

The committee report said that since the $9,000 needed for the traffic lights can't be fitted into this year's budget, the signals won't be installed until 1974.

So, racing fans, get your exercise while you can.

CUP story inaccurate

BURNABY (CUP) — Since the printing of Canadian University Press's story regarding the nomination of Pierre Trudeau for president of Simon Fraser University, a number of official denials have made it apparent that the story was not entirely accurate.

Although Trudeau's nomination is before the presidential search committee, it is not clear whether Trudeau is the source of the nomination or whether his name has been put before the committee by someone acting without Trudeau's permission.

Other famous personalities have also been listed by the committee and all candidates for the presidency will be measured against them. Eric Kierans, John Kenneth Galbraith, Sylvia Ostrey and Pauline Jewett have been placed in the prime category. None of the people, however, appear to have been contacted yet.

The report that committee members were sworn to secrecy while RCMP officers were present is wrong. The members, rather, agreed voluntarily and informally that the proceedings should remain under wraps.

Such a statement in fact was released by Paul Cote, chairman of the Board of Governors and the search committee.

"The search committee is in the very early stage of proceedings and one thing that always seems to happen in these proceedings is that they become surrounded by a whole series of rumors that have no foundation in fact," he said.

Queen slams province

KINGSTON (CUP) — "The Ontario government is ignoring provincial medical training centers," said Queens vice-principal of Health Sciences, Harold Kelly.

"At a time when Queens is attempting to plan a large, new health science complex, a new training program for doctors and an important new department in the faculty, there is just no way to approach the government for approval or assistance," Kelly said.

Queens is attempting to develop a new clinical sciences program which will allow medical students to get practical training during the program. However, Kelly complained, "we cannot get the government to recognize that there are educational costs in the clinical program."

Food Science wants five-years reprieve

By MARILYN EMERSON

Representatives of the Faculty of Food Sciences have requested — on the evidence of a 12-page brief — that the Planning and Resources Committee table for a minimum of five years its recommendation to phase out the Faculty.

No decision was made on the brief at Thursday's Governing Council meeting although the brief may be discussed prior to Council's December 20 meeting.

Supporting the food sciences phase-out policy, the committee in its report claims there has been "no growth in enrolment" at the faculty.

In a comparison of student registration in the Department of nutrition, School of Hygiene, with the faculty of Food Sciences, the faculty brief indicates registration is significantly higher in food sciences.

One chart shows on an undergraduate level, registration in food sciences has gone up to 277 in 1973-74 from 96 in 1970-71. There is no registration shown under same categories for the department of nutrition.

On a graduate level, registration at the faculty from 1970-71 through 1973-74 equals that of the department of nutrition except in 1973-74 when registration at the faculty doubled that of the department of nutrition.

The committee report proposes the Faculty's food sciences and nutrition programs be combined with the School of Hygiene's department of nutrition to form a new Department of Nutrition and Food Chemistry.

But faculty dean Ira Armstrong proposed on evidence in brief that the committee reverse its strategy and bring the department of hygiene into a larger Faculty of Food Sciences.

Regarding academic standards, another chart in the brief indicates "graduates known to have acquired higher degrees" between the years 1963 and 1973 at U of T and at other well-known universities. The chart shows every year 15 to 27 individuals have gone on for graduate degrees.

Regarding employment, another chart in the brief indicates "distribution of graduates by occupation" between the years 1963 and 1973.

The chart shows almost all graduates during these years obtained jobs in their area of study.

A 1970 report by the budget sub-committee of the now-defunct Senate said academic standards of the faculty had declined to the point where "it is unable to place its graduates."

The brief recommends the faculty retain its identity while its members implement changes. The faculty wants a new name, a new dean and a parity staff-student committee to define a new direction for faculty.

The faculty brief says their academic credibility is good "meeting academic standards outside the faculty."

The brief claims the committee has not proven the faculty is "unnecessary and undesirable" as the committee "proposes to teach similar subject matter under other university auspices."

The faculty brief claims the objectives of the proposed "new department" are "identical with those which have always been offered in the faculty."

The brief outlines: "In 1969-70 the earning capacity in 1973-74 will be $1.1 million while its estimated budget expenditures are $426,000 leaving the university a profit of $700,000."

The brief outlines: "In 1969-70 the faculty program emphasised nutrition in the same way as the new department proposes to do. It resulted in a deficit of some $224,000 (following Mr. Hiebert's budget pattern)."

Contrary to the committee's criticism that the faculty has "little research orientation," the brief claims the faculty has carried out research in the past, there are now ten projects under way, liaisons between hospitals and faculty continue and interaction with other campus divisions is growing.

Dean Armstrong has blamed the U of T administration for what the administration terms "research problems."

She says the administration wants "pure research" not socially relevant research. She says while faculty enrolment is currently up, teaching positions have been cut to 15 in 1973 from 22 in 1970.

"Faculty members have an enormous teaching load and administration will not hire any new professors," she said.

Scenes like this could continue at Artistic as the union has announced it will continue its fight.

Artistic strike not over yet

Violence on the picket line which has characterized the three-month strike at Artistic Woodwork proved to be the stumbling block this weekend in efforts to settle the strike. Labour Minister Fern Guindon said Friday the strike was over.

However, the management of the North York plant has refused to allow strikers charged on the picket line to return to their jobs, and the union planned a show of strength on the line this morning to protest management's position.

More than 110 persons, most of them supporters of the Canadian Textile and Chemical Workers Union, have been arrested since the strike began August 21.

The arrests, generally on relatively minor charges such as mischief, have resulted from pickets attempting to prevent non-union workers from entering the Densley Avenue plant while police push through the strike line.

After Guindon's Friday announcement that the strike was settled, the union announced it would not agree to the settlement until management agreed to hire back arrested workers.

Settlement of the strike had stalled over a management demand that it be able to set rules and arbitrarily fire employees who violated them.

The union said this clause would deny them their grievance rights as guaranteed by law.

Earlier negotiations had settled the issue of wages in the vicinity of a 65 cent an hour increase over the pre-strike level of $2 to $3.50 per hour.

Apparently agreement had been reached late last week over the clause of management's desire to set rules and fire workers in violation, although a news blackout had surrounded the efforts for a settlement as Guindon and Labour department mediation officials attempted to hammer out an agreement.

Artistic is Canada's largest picture-frame manufacturer and many of the 116 employees at the plant at the time the strike began were immigrant workers.

A union spokesman said about 80 per cent of the 80 employees still on strike are expected to return to work providing their jobs are assured. Many have taken temporary jobs to support their families.

Strike pay for the workers is $25. per week.

So far, according to the union, 11 workers have been arrested at the picket line and eight want to return to work.

The other arrested persons were mainly union sympathizers who sometimes numbered as much as 200 at the plant in the mornings when non-union workers enter the plant in carloads.

Some of those arrested have laid counter-charges against police, including Ward 6 Alderman Dan Heap arrested in a picket line incident earlier this month.

Most of the court cases for the accused are expected to come up in December or January.

Meeting on discipline

A meeting will be held today to continue building opposition to the Discipline Code. Plans may be laid for a mailing to students on the issue during the Christmas holidays. There will also be discussion on how to handle the request from the Governing Council for amendments to the Code. The meeting starts at 4 pm in the SAC office. Then people will move to a larger room.

U of T confirms high lead levels in Riverdale

By ANDREW FALUDY

An independent U of T report on high lead levels in the blood of Riverdale residents near the Canada Metals plant largely confirms City Board of Health samples taken last month.

The report, researched by U of T's Environmental Studies and Engineering Programme was issued recently, following months of research and investigation into reports of high lead levels in Toronto's east end.

According to Dallard Runge, of Neighborhood Renewal Corp., more than 50 people out of 700 in the neighborhood who were sampled had more than 40 milligrams per millilitre of lead in their blood.

The U of T report largely substantiates these claims. Of the 698 people tested by the U of T, about 6.5 per cent had lead levels of 40 micrograms per millilitre or higher.

Runge's figure of 50 out of 700 translates to about 7.1 per cent with lead levels of 40 micrograms per millilitre or higher.

According to the U of T report, the two highest samplings for lead in soil were recorded north and east of the Canada Metal plant.

"There is little doubt that the lead levels in soil immediately to the north of Canada Metal are abnormally high for the area," the report stated.

The report was less specific on the health hazard, contending that "it does not necessarily follow that the current rate of fallout if high or that there is a health hazard in the area."

Area residents have been particularly concerned about high lead levels in the blood of people living in the area.

Last month the Canada Metal plant was closed by a provincial ministry of the environment stop-work order after three area residents with high lead levels in their blood were admitted to hospital.

In spite of residents' protests the plant was re-opened after three days when the stop-work order was overturned in court.

The U of T report was not specific about the possible toxicological effects of high lead levels. Referring to lead levels in the hair of certain children who were sampled, the report merely said "whether these levels are of toxicological significance is beyond the range of expertise represented by our group."

Meanwhile, the Canada Metal plant continues to operate as it did before closure.

Gov Council member attacks government

Lynn Williams, director of the United Steel Workers of America's district six and a member of the U of T's Governing Council, strongly has attacked the provincial government for its handling of the Canada Metals case.

Williams, addressing the annual regional conference of the United Steel Workers at the Four Seasons Sheraton Hotel also blamed the peculiarities of the Ontario legal system for the handling of the case.

The Canada Metals plant, located at Eastern Avenue and Leslie Street was closed down for three days in October as the result of a stop work order issued by the Ministry of Environment.

The order was issued because the plant is a suspected source of lead emissions in the area.

"The government closed Canada Metal in Toronto with no regard for the 200 members of the International Chemicals Workers' Union who work there," Williams said.

"This action was taken 'nonchalantly, without feeling,' he added.

Williams did say that he was not opposed to the closure of a plant if it was unsafe.

"I can't think of any position we can hold as a union but this: if a plant is unsafe to the workers or the surrounding community, close it," he said.

"But protect the workers. Provide for their incomes, their mortgages, their children's schooling and the rest."

Williams also attacked the legal system, citing cases that had taken years to get arbitration.

"By comparison, it took Canada Metal's lawyers only one business day to get into courts to overturn the order to shut their lead plant in Toronto," he said.

"The legal system trots much faster when corporate profit is at stake."

The Varsity a member of Canadian University Press was founded in 1950 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Oasos Press Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors 91 St. George St.

'President has delegated power to Forster'

I noticed an item in the Globe and Mail and it struck me that its basic idea was one which could easily be transposed to the situation at the university.

"Metro executive committee publicly expressed concern for the first time yesterday over the growing transfer of power to the Metro chairman. The committee accepted the need for a budget review committee and a budget officer to review civic spending programs, but directed that budget review operations be placed under the control of Metro treasurer department rather than the Metro chairman's office."

Isn't it about time that our Governing Council began asking some questions about the steady transfer of power to the president's office? What checks have they tried to put on the budget review operations which now take place in that office?

Since the demise of the old Board of Governors, which exercised control over budgetary proposals of the president, and of the Senate, which acted as advisor on academic matters and had the power of veto therein, we've seen no real attempt on the part of the council to limit the power of the administration. What is happening is that the man who reviews the budget proposals then sits as chairman of the budget committee, and after that presents its report to the council.

Decision-making 'secret'

Unlike Metro Council, politics are closed in the university world. Decisions for the most part are not open to public scrutiny. You have already documented this weakness in your excellent editorial on the Faculty of Arts and Science Council. How do we know who really wields the power that is changing and shaping our university? Who in the Governing Council would be willing to stand up in public and say that the president — and through him the chief of the bureaucracy, the provost — is really running the university all by himself? Some of us would like to know a good deal more about what goes on behind the closed doors of our governmental corridors at Simcoe Hall. In particular, who decides the fundamental question: where will the money go?

Unfortunately, the members of the Governing Council always seem to ask the wrong questions if they ask any questions at all. These are matters that your ordinary faculty member — working away at his courses in history or fine arts, botany or chemistry — is usually too busy to ponder. And these are questions too far removed from the ordinary student — working away, for his part, at exams and essays — to force him to raise his eyes from his own petty concerns.

Administrators certainly can't ask questions out loud since their 'baronies' depend for their bread and butter on maintaining good relations with the centre. There is no working press gallery to demand access to the closed meetings of important committees. As for the Governing Council, few of its members are experienced enough or have enough information to ask the right questions at the right time. The result, as already noted, becomes increasingly evident: power gravitates to the president's office.

Decisions handed down from the top

Not for the 70's, the open discussion of all points of view at council

During 1972-73, Professor Forster was chairman of the following committees:

- *task force on academic appointments,
- *search committee for new dean of medicine,
- *search committee for new warden of Hart House,
- *search committee for new principal of Scarborough college,
- *search committee for new dean of engineering,
- *search committee for new principal of college for part-time students, reaches the committee.

*all orders from the council and its committees concerning academic matters go through him, *all appointments (academic) are authorized by him, *all appointments up to the rank of chairman of the department are authorized by him on behalf of the president and the council. They are reported to the academic affairs committee only for information.

In short, and at the risk of some oversimplification, it appears that the president has handed over to his provost a very great deal of authority in both money and personal matters. As our senior administrators are so often chosen by the man who has such a central part in the loosening or the tightening of the strings of our money bags, does it seem reasonable to expect that they will be able to assert much independence against the policies of the centre — even on their own fields?

There's no doubt that presidents of this university have always had the use of considerable power, but most have exercised it cautiously after pretty careful sounding out of the various constituencies of the university. Dr. Bissell even added to the Senate and the Board a President's Council drawn from all parts of the university to advise him on key issues. Unhappily, Dr. Evans seems to rely on a tight little clique known familiarly as the "Simcoe Circle." During the past year and a half, the various constituencies have watched the Evans administration proceed to decisions with little or no consultation outside this circle.

Questions are now being asked about the singular lack of dissenting briefs on issues presented to the Academic Affairs Committee. There used to be some dissent, in the "bad old days" of the Senate. Where have all the dissenters gone? Is it possible that their briefs are simply "screened out" before they can get to committee level?

Under the present system in which one man collates the material that is presented to committee members, and very often, it seems, then chairs a committee, or himself appoints the chairman, whose report is rubber-stamped by the council, there is a basic lack of accountability. Such power can be justified by the technocrats with the argument that only they, with computer-given facts at hand, can be relied on to identify problems and apply solutions.

The result of this new climate within the University of Toronto is what some people are beginning to recognize as a fascinating, indeed almost a textbook, exercise in manipulative politics, better known to the in-group at Simcoe Hall as "good government management."

These are hard questions. They have to be asked now because the Governing Council is about to strike a committee (if it has not already done so) to review itself. The two year trial stipulated by the province at the time of passing the new act will very soon be up. Do we want to see a continuation of a system weak because it has no checks and balances built in to prevent the passing of the real governing power to the administration?

committees. Among the technocratic managers now in control at Simcoe Hall, it seems that such procedure is considered an inefficient and 'wasteful' way to govern. We understand that the usual procedure is for the provost to present the solution to the problem, either in person or through a vice-provost, and for the troops, i.e., committee members, to stand to attention. The means for exercising this manipulative control are easily identifiable. For the record, an outline of some of the provost's powers, as gathered from announcements in The Varsity, is here set out for the first time.

*university budget committee (the single most important committee in the university.

Additional powers of the provost (gathered from talks with members of the Governing Council):

*all academic divisions report directly to him (i.e. 20 faculties, five constituent colleges, the computer centre, library, media centre, admissions, awards), *all material for the Academic Affairs committee of the Governing Council and its sub-committees goes through his personal desk before it institutes, centres, etc.) are authorized by him, *all pay increases (except in the case of senior salaries) are authorized by him, *all budgets of all academic divisions are authorized by him for transmission to the budget committee, *at the president's request, he has dealt with hiring, firing, transfers of deans and principals, *central role in all decisions relating to academic tenure promotion, and firing of academic staff.

Levitt is best of student governors

As a frequent observer of Governing Council meetings I was deeply distressed by Varsity's quote, "snore, as Howard Levitt makes yet another speech." Rather than awakening students to the fact that Mr. Levitt is providing leadership in the important issues that have arisen as yet this year, you appear to ridicule his accomplishments. This fits in well with other editorials, i.e. the editorial on the anti-racist demonstration, as it has a divisive effect on the progressive student movement.

Far better than condemning Mr. Levitt for his many effective, if long-winded addresses, would it not be more appropriate to criticize most of the other student governors for their absence of any input. Given the low proportion of students on the Governing Council the only viable role that students can play is to criticize and expose the workings and anti-student nature of the Council's recommendations. It seems that in fulfilling this function Mr. Levitt should have your whole-hearted support and coverage, yet conspicuously absent from your articles has been Mr. Levitt's initiation and leadership of the struggles for greater emphasis on undergraduate teaching, and the fight against racism, 188 Yonge St., and parity in the U of T Act review committee.

If one were only to read Varsity, as many students do, for information they would have a greatly distorted picture of student governor's participation in the Governing Council. Although there has been no input to report of from other student governors, that is, Mr. Barnes, Mr. Vickery before resignation, Ms. Dick, why hasn't this negation of responsibility been criticized?

Mankind's saviors: the engineers

In last Wednesday's Varsity Herbert Richardson, Professor of Religious Studies, suggests that engineering be abandoned as a university discipline because it lacks in "human sensitivities".

One wonders how much "human sensitivities" has religion of any sort ever brought us. Obvious examples of Northern Ireland, the Spanish Inquisition, the Middle East War immediately spring to mind. To anyone who is not a religious fanatic it would seem that people in Belfast would see that a lot better off without religious "human sensitivities".

With a record like this and using Herbert Richardson's litmus test of "human sensitivity" it would seem that if anything should be abandoned as a university discipline Religious Studies must be first on the list. Then people like Herbert Richardson would be forced to earn an honest living instead of poisoning young minds with sexual guilt and funeral home mentality.

On the subject of engineers, does Herbert Richardson realize how much his own existence and livelihood depend on them? He probably delivers his oracles of wisdom in an electrically lighted room, the electricity provided by an engineer-designed and operated electrical system. He drinks water pumped by engineer-designed and operated pumps. One could go on forever like this. If all the professors of religious studies quit tomorrow no one would notice the difference. However, if all the engineers went on strike this country could not go on operating for longer than five minutes.

How many wars were ever caused by engineers? I dare Herbert Richardson to name any. Hitler was not an engineer, neither was Stalin. Neither Lyndon Johnson or Ho Chi Minh were engineers. Mussolini and Himmler were certainly not engineers. The strife in Northern Ireland was certainly not caused by engineers, neither were the Crusades. None of the Religious Wars in Europe were caused by engineers.

If anything is a threat to world peace and humanity it is more likely to be religion than engineering. It has never been proven that social studies, arts, or religious studies ever made the students care more for humanity or make them less likely to start wars or oppress workers. In fact, most of the above-mentioned men studied either religion, art, or humanities and social studies at one time in their lives.

The suggestion that the Toike Oike shapes the minds of engineering students is as ridiculous as suggesting that The Varsity shapes the minds of U of T students. Years of communist propaganda in The Varsity have failed to substantially increase the membership of pro-communist groups on campus who all combined (SDS, Communist Club, Young Socialists, RMG, Communist Party of Canada (M-L), Chile Solidarity, etc.) still number less than 100 active members, less than one half of one per cent of U of T daytime students.

When one reads Herbert Richardson's letter to The Varsity there is no doubt about which part of the university produces incompetents.

Even racism should be aired

I would like to express my opinion on SDS's call for suppression of racist views on campus.

My own feeling is that the university ought to be a place where competing views on a variety of subjects are aired. This will give me as well as my fellow students the opportunity to examine the various ideas presented, and to judge and act in accordance with our own reason and conscience.

It may be that some ideas are untruthful and that these ideas will influence our actions to the detriment of society. Freedom of expression provides no guarantee that society will benefit from the ideas expressed. What it does guarantee is that an individual or group of individuals will monopolize the expression of thought on the campus. What it does guarantee is that we will not be denied the right to examine and criticize various opinions however disagreeable they may be to some. What it does guarantee is that we need not fear to express our own opinions, even though a self-righteous group of students disagrees with us.

I will defend the right of any individual on campus to express his views to any audience that wishes to listen provided he does so in an orderly and peaceful fashion. This principle I apply to the members of the SDS-even though I believe that, in doing so, I take the risk that their view if widely enough accepted will work to the detriment of society.

Varsity reportage riles conservative

As co-organizer of The Campus Alternative organizing meeting I would like to comment on your coverage of that meeting (November 21, "Varsity: a commie plot?"). First, Mr. Fromm did not "surface" at the U of T Monday, he is a student enrolled in the School of Graduate Studies. Second, Mr. Fromm is not involved in any "campaign to keep Canada white", indeed when the matter of that Western Guard slogan was raised, it was Mr. Fromm himself who pointed out the absurdity of it. Third, Mr. Fromm did not "announce the formation of what he calls Campus Alternative". The group was formed at the meeting and the name The Campus Alternative suggested (I do not recall by whom) at the meeting, and adopted by the students present. Fourth, the "pile of printed material" consisted of 20 or 30 magazines and books of interest to conservatives but having no connection to the organization, which I specifically mentioned at the time. Fifth, Mr. Fromm did not aim "his sights at The Varsity", nor is "The Varsity's" "destruction" the "first priority" of our organization. The matter of The Varsity was mentioned towards the end of the meeting and was taken up enthusiastically by some of the people in attendance. Sixth, the emphasis in your article on what Mr. Fromm was supposed to have said, done or thought is completely at odds with the tone of the meeting which I set in my welcoming address and which I emphasized at a later point, saying that we "were not attempting to enforce any sort of an ideological orthodoxy". Seventh, no mention was made in the article of the SDS members who attempted to slander Mr. Fromm and otherwise disrupt the proceedings.

Your article was the worst sort of irresponsible, misleading, distorted and prejudiced reporting, and a prime example of what The Campus Alternative would seek to correct.

Trins object to discipline code

We write in view of the current controversy raised by the proposed discipline code and wish to inform you of the nature of Trinity College's concern in this matter.

Widespread concern has been voiced by a significant number of students from this college regarding the discretionary clauses in the proposed documents, the all-too-apparent movement in contradiction of the spirit of the Campbell Report, and the complete lack of information and consultation which has allowed this code to surface in monolithic form.

We are aggravated that the discipline code should come before the Governing Council of the University of Toronto for its implementation without adequate consultation with, and consideration of, student interests in general, and the interests of the federated colleges.

Trinity College has, on its own initiative, established a parity committee to investigate the tenor, implications, terms of reference, and the legality of the proposed new code. This committee has in its interim report expressed concern over the indefinite powers allocated by the documents and, indeed, over the dubious legal principles on which it is based.

Until such time as this committee has had an opportunity to present its final report and recommendations as to whether Trinity College should (or must) accept all or any part of the proposed code and tribunal procedures, we strongly disagree that any action should be taken towards implementation at this time. The college currently functions adequately under the provisions of a document derived from the Campbell Report and consequently, questions the need for a "total" revision of disciplinary policy.

In light of the considerations mentioned above, any attempt to implement in whole or in part, the new discipline code, would be at this time a disservice to the University community in general, an affront to student representation and the student body, and would subvert the attempt of Trinity College to issue a statement of position.

We sincerely trust that this communication will serve to clarify our position regarding the role of Trinity College in the matter of the proposed discipline code.

We appreciate your continuing efforts in this regard. We hope that similar statements will be forthcoming from the other federated colleges.

Silent majority defends skule

I read the letter "Toike Viciousness" in the November 21 Varsity and it is rare that I get wrought up about any kind of issue let alone one that is so mundane. However, when someone comes out and deprecates the Society of Engineering as a whole merely because he doesn't happen to like a bi-weekly rag that is taken seriously by few people, it is time for the silent majority to say something.

Professor Richardson is talking through his hat at a great distance from the matter when he tries to correlate the effect of the Toike on engineering graduates. I put myself among the 99 per cent of this faculty that have the "competence", maturity and presence of mind to dismiss much of what is printed in the Toike as simply poor humour. I think that the Toike is very representative of our faculty on issues of consequence but when it comes to senseless drivel, the Toike is very capable of showing its disdain if only to further incense the involved parties. I could well take a stab at The Varsity here which, I am sure, represents a small minority of students on campus. There is an obvious parallel between the two papers. I doubt that there is an engineer on campus that has developed racial hatred, as was suggested, as a result of our paper. It takes more intelligence to make light of what is printed than to go into a tirade over it.

Professor Richardson should pick up a faculty calendar and educate himself on what courses are already offered in the way of what he advocated. There are two or three in-house electives that deal directly with technological impact on society, responsibility of the engineer in society, etc.

It was asked, "Where is the failure?" in our engineering program. There has been no failure except that of Professor Richardson to understand the circumstances surrounding the issue.

His closing recommendation, "that engineering be abandoned as a university discipline" is an extremely naive statement and one that I would not expect to hear from a professor. I can only regard such contempt, people who advocate such tripe. In other words, people who have all the answers but no viable solutions.

Colonial currency: a call to action

Have you noticed that, with increasing frequency in recent months, the pinball machine spits out your dimes, the cigarette dispenser cheerfully accepts your change but refuses to deliver the goods, the code vendor tinkles and buzzes oddly when you drop that quarter in, the gum-ball cyclops breaks your wrist when you turn the knob because that penny didn't fit? Are you troubled with self-doubt on seeing information images turning up on your pennies, nickels and dimes; Lincoln Memorial, the Yankee eagle, the benignly smiling Father of Somebody Else's Nation? "In God We Trust" instead of "Elizabeth II D.G. Regina"? You too, friend, may be suffering from colonial currency.

Nickel-and-dime imperialism is not new to Canada, or perhaps more than subliminally important, but it has certainly assumed new prominence lately. The influx of the American tourist dollars, quarter-dollars and so on to Toronto is one significant factor. A more economically significant point, however, is that since the US started minting money made from pocket lint, chipboard and tinfol it began, in some quarters (no pun intended), to stockpile older Canadian silver for the high intrinsic value of that metal as well as its face value. The result in part has been that the flow of Canadian coinage to the south has been predictably matched by an equivalent or near-equivalent flow of intrinsically worthless American change into Canada.

I do not feel that this situation will bankrupt Canada (though every little bit helps) or cripple the booming Yonge St. pinball industry, nevertheless, it is more than tiresome to receive, as I did recently in a U of T cafeteria, three American quarters and one Canadian when requesting change for a dollar. (Environmentalists to the contrary, at present the Canadian caribou seems to me far more an "endangered species" than the American bald eagle.)

It is perhaps significant to note, too, that one of the ways in which the classical archaeologist can clearly state and define the expansion of the Roman Empire is by the prevalence of Roman coinage in the colonies it occupied or economically dominated.

I'm not clear as to what can be done to resolve this trivial but, to me, irksome situation, and invite suggestions. Nevertheless, some possibilities come to mind: 1) bore a hole in the American eagle and use him as a washer for that leaky faucet; 2) refuse to accept American change as a rule—"I want real money!" 3) expand on Washington's myth, instead of skipping a silver dollar across the Potomac, try to pitch an American nickel across Lake Ontario (or float it across Lake Erie); 4) weld American pennies, dimes, etc., together to make necklaces and garish objets d'art, which can be resold at extravagant prices in a booth at the CNE to tourists for (yes!) still more American currency.

The politics of torture: a common but covert practice

reprinted from the Chevron

During military exercises in Dartmoor, England this spring, "captured" navy officers were allegedly interrogated using sensory deprivation techniques of a type previously used, but now banned, in Northern Ireland.

Last year six Belgian paratroopers were convicted of torturing four "captured" soldiers during NATO exercises.

And it has been recently alleged that several years ago in Germany US Special Forces instructors taught torture tactics to border guards, who passed on their knowledge to local police.

This torture training is symptomatic of the increasing application of torture as a matter of government policy, and of its increasing sophistication. Torture is now a grim science with its own research facilities, specialists and schools.

Brazil offers a textbook course in torture

The increasing sophistication is best illustrated by evidence from Brazil. There, according to the Amnesty International Report on Allegations of Torture in Brazil, published last year, interrogation rooms are elaborately fitted out with speakers and television to use grotesque sound and light shows that reduce their victims to nervous wrecks. In one instance, images of the victim's family were alternated with approaching high speed trains, piercing screams and strobe-lights. This sophisticated psychological torture chamber required government co-ordination of research and technical expertise far beyond the resources of a conventional police department. It represents not only national, but international, co-operation in torture.

Torture is difficult to investigate and hard facts are limited. Occasionally there are breakthroughs, such as the publicity last year of the attempt by Pakistan to buy torture equipment in the US, or the defection of three Uruguayan torturers who told of the involvement of the US Agency for International Development (AID) in torture training in Latin America.

But investigation primarily is work for jigsaw specialists who match affidavits, check medical evidence, and alalyze government contracts. Most of the research is done by Amnesty International, which has contacts and sometimes field workers in most countries of the world. Reports tend to come from doctors, lawyers, students, and journalists — people who are able to talk to torture victims and also get reports out of the country.

Amnesty also gets unsolicited reports which it attempts to verify through its contact network. Amnesty is also able to talk to exiles, and because it is common practice to make victims watch the torture of others, it is possible to obtain some degree of corroboration. The Brazil report, for example, lists 1,081 people who are reported to have been tortured and discusses nine cases in gory detail.

Medical personnel involved

Evidence indicates that torture is now routine in over 30 countries, and there is a growing involvement of doctors, behavioral psychologists, pharmacologists, and technicians. Primitive methods based on physical force remain common, but as the practice is illegal there is an effort not to leave incriminating marks. Physical methods often involve electricity and modern technology: psychological methods use drugs and sensory deprivation.

No magic potion yet exists to make a prisoner "tell all". But drugs can be used to encourage a prisoner to give information. Although the suggestive effect of an intravenous injection of sodium pentothal can often induce a suspect to talk more freely, the quest for a real truth drug continues, particularly in Latin America under the guidance of US experts.

The military hospital in Montevideo, Uruguay, is renowned for its special "recipe" of taquiflexil and sodium pentothal. The first of these, a drug derived from curare, produces terrible agony brought on by painful muscle contractions and unless administered under strict medical supervision, is fatal. The subject is kept alive in an oxygen tent for several hours until he receives a weak dose of sodium pentothal which produces a total relaxation and semi-conscious euphoria which the interrogator then capitalizes on.

An entire ward was set aside in the Montevideo Military Hospital to "treat" some prisoners in this way. The high number of heart X-rays awoke the suspicions of some civilian doctors and nurses who were then replaced by trusted military medical staff. Since that time one "suicide" and two cases of cerebral paralysis have been directly linked to this treatment.

Much information on Uruguay comes from Captain Guerrero, an army doctor at the military hospital who defected to Chile early this year with his family. He said he left Uruguay because of the torture and because of US involvement in the torture. Details of the torture have been published by the Culsa Latina, and the Ultima Hora, a newspaper in Montevideo. Uruguay has confirmed that it has been explosive debate in parliament about them.

Soviet Union most advanced

Applied pharmacology some time with abuse of power in the Soviet Union to questionably the most sophisticated in political control. The co-ordination of psychiatric hospitals and they receive in these institutions advanced weapon in political control.

In the early 1950's and been clear that psychiatric dissenters are not based on objective tests but on most frequently mentioned with such diagnosis of mental illness. Professor D. R. Lunts of the Forensic Psychiatry. A prisoner in the uniform of a KGB team under his direction findings of mental normal chiatric institutes; the commendations of the Soviet Union.

Political prisoners thus plain of treatment with drugs recalling his period of "treatment" he received aminazin injections feel more awful than anything before; you no sooner lie get up, you no sooner to long to sit down, you no longer there's nowhere to walk.

Medical practitioners often

There is often close medical practitioners and again, torture affidavits international refer to a variety of doctors in a variety of ways categorized. One finds, for doctor—a physician who either delayed or "unavailable" South African testimony par nations offers a mild instance.

"Another accused, M. became gravely ill in prison the prison doctor who diagnosed and ordered that he be sent. But the patient was not released because of a shock though he was screaming.

The "token" doctor appears best—frustrated, of course he is working. But, his very or interrogation centre responsible treatment. In evidence that the "token" effective treatment or relief.

Much more clearly a "living" doctor—a physician report is false. This is not for the police doctor. I observers have been known political pressure, to suppress.

Two French teachers, J. Andre Menras, released in and one-half years in Chile alleged that a visiting team International Red Cross his victims, been handed written been told of various sub prison authorities to disguise. Yet, in its official report, it mention of this evidence.

Other physicians included, present at a critical stage certifies that the victim of treatment, and the "revivifying" ministers treatment during enable the torture to continue to maximize the pain. A London, Lucio Havió Uch recounted the fate of his victim.

"Fayal de Lira also underwent torture, a name given to the brutally by the torturers sists of keeping the tortured instrument whilst Fayal was chair", his torturers meant drill and electric shock treatment broke three of his teeth; but several attacks of fainting at the end. A doctor saw him, injection and indicated that he continue."

Present-day torture experiments

Not all of the scientific in that direct. The sensory deprivation used in Northern Ireland since him to lean on his hands putting a hood over his head him to deafening noise—some perfectly innocent years ago by Dr. John Lilly. Best known for attempts of dolphins, Lilly also tried to study his own mind. One technique was to float in body temperature water in a sound proof room, which removed all sensory stimuli. The longest recorded duration of any subject in the tank is 10 hours, with the average being less than four hours.

Despite what we would like to believe about Vietnam, prisoners are still held and tortured in jails, like these shoe-shine boys.

Other sensory deprivation techniques indicate the following results: evidence of cognitive deterioration, thought disorder, paranoid states, anxiety, hallucination, and schizophrenic-like states.

According to Tim Shallice of the National Hospital, London, in an article in Cognition (volume 1, number 3) this is exactly what happened in Ulster. "The Ulster methods are those produced by the conscious using of available scientific knowledge, for an attempt was clearly made to reduce the change of sensory input—a scientific abstraction—to its practical limits. Not surprisingly, psychologists by investigating the nature of brainwashing have improved it."

Technology also has a place. One instrument widely used in some Latin American torture centres is an electric refinement of the straight pin called "piguada", which is inserted under the victim's fingernails. Other applications of technology being investigated by Amnesty International are the "purple room" in Rio de Janeiro where the victim is subjected to ultraviolet light, and the "reverberation chamber" in Buenos Aires, where a victim is laid on a couch and forced to listen to tape recordings of his own torture.

Torture exported to the Third World

Torture is not always a local product—it is exported through military assistance programs and police training schools. Late last year, for example, six Belgian paratroopers were convicted of inflicting tortures on two lieutenants and two sergeants captured from another Belgium unit during a NATO exercise.

During the trial, one of the defence witnesses, Colonel Pierre Crevocœur told the court he had been present as an observer at interrogations of Belgian volunteers by British "specialists"—a charge denied by British military spokesmen.

Even more recently, disputes between a West German police trade union and the paramilitary Federal Border Guard led to public allegations that torture tactics had been taught by US Special Forces instructors to West German Border Police who had used these techniques in training sessions involving regular police units. A special government inquiry subsequently substantiated these allegations, referring to a US interrogations centre at Lenggries, Upper Bavaria, where troops undergo "controlled toughening-up treatment".

Evidence is mounting that US agencies are major torture exporters, primarily through training of Third World police in the field by AID officials and at the International Police Academy (IPA) in Washington, DC. The most widely publicized and best documented case of US aid involvement is the Mitrone affair in Uruguay. A Uruguay police official in a newspaper interview implicated a US AID official, Dan Mitrone, in torture training. Shortly after that, Mitrone was assassinated, apparently because he was believed to be responsible for what is widely called the Mitrone vest. This device is an inflatable vest which can be used to increase pressure on the chest during interrogation, sometimes crushing the rib cage.

Other US involvement must be deduced indirectly, but in Vietnam and Brazil the evidence is particularly strong. The National Police responsible for a large percentage of the torture in Saigon were trained through AID programs. And one of the biggest AID/IPA projects is in Brazil, the centre of some of the most sophisticated and brutal torture.

In a 1971 report, The US Office of Public Safety said that "through December 1969, the Public Safety Project in Brazil has assisted in training locally over 100,000 federal and state police personnel. Additionally, 523 persons received training in the United States."

The US, of course, denies that it teaches torture, and in fact argues that it is teaching more humane methods that are now being used. But the significance of such humane methods was best summed up by Byron Engle, Director of the Office of Public Safety. Citing the successful application of their techniques in the Dominican Republic in 1965, he said: "police action was so effective that the insurgents did not even end up with the body of a dead comrade to drag through the city in false martyrdom."

Scientists have not spoken out

Despite the widespread use of science, technology, and medicine in torture, there has been pathetically little response from the scientific community. For example, the most clear-cut and well-documented instance of contemporary torture science is the incarceration of dissidents in Soviet psychiatric hospitals.

Considerable internal pressure was generated by the World Psychiatric Association at its last meeting in Mexico City two years ago to openly debate a resolution condemning this treatment. But the bureaucracy of the WPA, and the hesitance of many of its members to take a stand on a political issue led to a final non-act of frustrated silence.

With almost no complaint from the scientific community, the practitioners of this grey science continue their search for new ways to orchestrate human pain.

A typical approach to questioning, in Vietnam, in which the suspect is nearly suffocated

Since the author of this article was continuing his investigation into torture in the Third World countries at the time of first printing, he chose to remain anonymous.

Canadian spent time in Santiago stadium

By TRISH BLACKSTAFFE

A Canadian citizen who has recently returned from Chile after spending 10 days in the Estadio Nacional, was in Toronto this week to tell what happened to him in Santiago.

Bob Everton, 23, of Burnaby, B.C. was in Chile at the time of the coup and spent 10 days in the stadium jail with many thousands of other prisoners.

"It was only through the diligent efforts of the two Canadian embassy first secretaries Marc Dolgin and David Adams, that I and two other Canadians were finally released," he said.

He added: "Had all the members of the embassy staff been of the same mentality as Ambassador Ross I might have likely been labelled 'international riff-raff' and today still be held in some concentration camp in Chile."

A September 20 confidential cable (see Varsity Nov. 21) from Canadian Ambassador Andrew Ross to Ottawa said: "We have checked as best we can by phone and know of no instances of injury or mistreatment of Canadians..."

According to Everton, a fellow Canadian, Bill Patterson, was beaten several times at his interrogation because he was unable to reply in Spanish to the question his interrogators posed.

Everton, who had been in Chile twice before, arrived there on holidays for the third time August 4. He spoke for several hours of his experiences in those uncertain days following the coup.

On the morning of the coup, September 11, "I went in to the centre of Santiago to get a first-hand report of what was happening because I knew it was the only way I would find out."

"I could walk through the streets fairly easily because by morning snipers had already taken up positions on rooftops." These pro-Allende snipers situated throughout the city were holding the attention and the fire of three military regiments, he said.

Everton, who was darting in and out of doorways until he came within about two blocks of the Moneda Palace watched as the presidential palace was bombed by two Hawker Hunter jets.

"I later learned, when reading El Mercurio, one of the two of Santiago's original 13 newspapers that were allowed to publish immediately following the coup, that Allende had said he would resign if the junta would come into the Moneda and talk with him."

"They refused and with Allende's final refusal the junta said that they would then bomb the Moneda at 12 noon."

According to the newspaper Allende had retorted that he did not believe that the Chilean Air Force had the accuracy to bomb the Moneda without destroying the neighbouring buildings.

"At about 11:30 am two helicopters circled over the presidential palace which El Mercurio reported contained the two pilots who later bombed the building."

Everton spoke to an eyewitness later who told him that he heard the two pilots, as they descended the jets, speaking English. The names of these two men have still not been released. Many non-American Air Forces train pilots in the U.S.

"At noon, the two planes flew over the Moneda dropping bombs and made the machine-gun and tank fire in the streets inaudible."

"On the radio the junta was telling everyone to go home and stay inside. There were no problems, everything was taken care of. They kept announcing that there were no wounded or dead but there were many bodies in the streets."

Everton said after the bombing more and more troops filled up the centre of Santiago, and he was gradually pushed out from the centre of the city, occasionally being frisked by the troops.

"The same day announcements were made over the radio that all foreigners who had arms or who did not have their papers in order should report to the nearest police station and nothing would happen to them."

"Later in the Estadio Nacional (where he was held captive), I met a Brazilian with two black eyes and a broken nose who had had his papers in order and had reported to the local police station."

"After being asked his name and nationality he was beaten up and left unattended on the ground all night."

Five days after the coup Everton was picked up to have his papers checked, and was then taken to the Bureau of Investigations where he was told they were in order.

"I was taken to another office and told we are waiting for an official from the Canadian Embassy."

"It was a lie. At 6 o'clock when curfew fell, two uniformed police and one plain-clothed cop came, took my passport, put a machine gun to my head and said let's go."

"We got into a waiting car. I asked where we were going and the plain-clothed policeman said, jokingly, to the cemetery."

From there he was taken to a police station where he spent the night in a room with several other people. Each time he fell asleep a guard would come by and hit him telling him that this was not a hotel.

The other people in the room with him included a 13-year-old girl whose father was suspected of being in the Socialist Party and an 75-year-old couple whose son was wanted because he was a militant factory worker.

The next morning at seven, before the curfew rose, those people remaining at the police station were taken away to the Estadio Nacional.

"After being frisked my name was written in a book and I was placed in a room with 110 other foreigners. Every day more people would come, no one left. Six days later there were 180 people in the room."

"Once two guards came into the room and beat three people in the spine with rifle butts until they collapsed and then left. I could hear people being beaten and shot every night."

"In the section where I was detained, I saw 1,000 people. After my interrogation on the seventh day I was taken to another similar section that held another 1,000 people."

"In the outdoor section (open air seats) I saw 2,000 people and in the entrance ways that were locked, leading from all sides into the stadium, were between 200 and 300 clean-shaven prisoners with blankets around them."

"It was a concentration camp. One soldier told me there were at least 16,000 people in the stadium although official reports ranged from 5,000 to 7,000."

"In spite of the horrors of being locked in overcrowded rooms, sleeping on a hard floor and eating a few spoonfuls of food a day we were lucky. Many never made it to the concentration camps."

"With respect to the credibility of the newspapers allowed to publish after the coup, one article appeared claiming that no atrocities had occurred in the Estadio Nacional and that all prisoners were sleeping on mattresses with blankets and eating four meals a day with dessert. These are the newspapers which are giving reports to the Canadian press of what is happening now in Chile."

Everton was one of the 14 protesters arrested Monday at the Canadian Immigration Department offices at University and Dundas, after a four-hour sit-in organized by the Chile Solidarity Committee protesting Canada's policy with regard to Chilean refugees.

Budget centralizes power in Forster's hands

By BOB GAUTHIER

Vice-president and provost Don Forster, already one of the most powerful men in the university's administration, had his power increased further by the budget committee. Forster is also chairman of the advisory committee on the 1974-75 budget.

Some examples of specific areas where Forster's power was increased with respect to the 1974-75 budget recommendations are:

- The following members of the teaching staff "should not receive merit increases except after special review" by Forster's office "in consultation with the appropriate division head: "those members of teaching staff (excluding clinical staff in the Faculties of Medicine and Dentistry (whose 1973-74 salaries exceed $16,000 (lecturer), $19,650 (assistant professor) and $23,800 (associate professor))

- the budget committee recommends the establishment of a fund of $150,000 in Forster's office "to be allocated, in consultation with the dean of the School of Graduate Studies, to divisions on all campuses to assist in equalizing pay scales for graduate teaching assistants.

- Erindale—$250,000 of a $884,133 proposed expenditure increase is to be held in a "suspense account" in Forster's office to be allotted for expenditures at the college "only if a stringent and thorough administrative review of the college's budget demonstrates a need for all or a portion of these funds;"

- Faculty of Medicine—a $100,000 contingency fund is to be held by dean A.L. Chute "for reassignment in line with changing faculty priorities." However, "these funds should not be used to create additional continuing commitments without explicit approval by the office of the vice-president and provost;"

- Faculty of Education—$25,000 fund "for travel currently included in the Faculty of Education budget to be transferred to the general university travel account in Forster's office;

- Faculty of Law—recommended $30,000 increase, "to be placed in a "suspense account" from which spending will be authorized "by Forster's office if the faculty implements the "Third Year Cluster Program" described in the budget submission.

- Division of University Extension—$100,000 "suspense account" in Forster's office.

- Library—of the approximately $450,000 income expected to be generated from sales, etc., $250,000 will be placed in a special account, expenditures from which will be authorized by Forster when the actual costs of computer services to other libraries and institutions can be more accurately determined.

- Office of the Vice-President and Provost—a net increase of $30,000 to be held in a "suspense account" to cover costs related to the establishment of the college for part-time students.

Forster also reviews departments

The budget committee also recommended that Forster review several aspects of various divisions with a view to cost-cutting and academic streamlining. Some of its recommendations are:

Faculty of Medicine

- review the degree program in Art as Applied to Medicine by the dean and the faculty's Long Range Planning and Assessment Committee, and at an early date, prepare program.

The budge committee's report noted that in 1973-74 "a total of 10

Don Forster, Shooting star in Simcoe Hall circles.

a report for Forster and Institutional Relations and Planning vice-president Jack Sword on the future of this program in the university, the role of and demand for these graduates in the community, alternative methods of training graduates in Art as Applied to Medicine, and the resource implications of the students are enrolled in the three-year program as compared to a projected enrolment of 15."

- a report should be presented to Forster by the faculty regarding extra-university teaching. Specifically, the report notes that "Members of the teaching staff have been providing a significant amount of instruction to a variety of health-related personnel in programs that are not under the control of the university. A review of the amount, nature, appropriateness and resource implications of these activities should be undertaken to determine if cost recoveries might be obtained for the university."

- a report should be submitted to Forster by dean Chute involving a critical review of the faculty's programs and priorities. The review should assess how effectively both the university and external resources are being used, make recommendations on the need for clinical teaching facilities and the university's responsibility for the provision of these facilities, and review the systems method of teaching, adopted by the faculty several years ago.

- the dean should review with Forster and Business Affairs Vice-president Alex Rankin how much time full-time members of the clinical staff spend in patient-care activities as a regular part of their duties and how much income is received independent of the university. The report recommends: "If the dean of the faculty is to effectively plan the operations of the faculty, he must be able to exercise adequate control over the amount of activity in this area, and have some control over the use of the funds generated by the activity."

Faculty of Nursing

- Forster should "make arrangements for further study of the faculty's programs and plans" and the "results of such a study should be available in time for next year's budget review and submitted to the Planning and Resources Committee and the Academic Affairs Committee. (Apparently the faculty had commented in its budget submission on the heavy teaching loads and the lack of opportunity for research leaves.

School of Physical and Health Education

- Forster should launch a study of the school's program and plans in light of available funds and facilities and, in conjunction with Internal Affairs vice-president Jill Conway, explore the school's relationships with the athletic associations.

Faculty of Education

- additional areas where savings might be possible should be explored by Forster in consultation with acting-dean H.O. Barrett, including: increased co-operation with the Faculty of Library Science in facilities for the training of school librarians; use of the services of the U of T computer centre rather than renting computer service elsewhere; integration of teaching in the summer program into normal teaching loads in the faculty; use of by other university divisions of the audio-visual facilities located in the faculty.

University of Toronto Computer Centre

- Forster should review periodically the divisional income and expenditures with the controller's office to ensure that actual income generated is as anticipated. However, the above are only some of the additional responsibilities granted to Forster by the budget committee recommendations.

Forster already possesses considerable power within the administration with regard to academic-related functions. For example,

- all academic divisions report directly to him,

- he sees all material for the Academic Affairs committee and its sub-committees before it goes to the committee(s),

- he deals with hiring, firing, and transfers of deans and principals at the president's request;

- he plays a central role in all decisions relating to academic tenure, promotion and the firing of academic staff; (for example, he sits on the Task Force on Academic Appointments, more commonly referred to as the Forster task force).

Forster also authorizes:

- all academic appointments,
- all appointments up to the rank of chairman of the department, on behalf of the president and the Governing Council. The appointments are reported to the Academic Affairs committee for information only.

- all pay increases, except in the case of senior salaries,

- all transfers in and additions to the budgets of all the academic divisions,

- all budgets of all academic divisions for transmission to the budget committee.

Schwartz traces Mao's vision

By DAVID SIMMONDS

Mao Tse-tung is a "sphinx-like" figure who "retires like Achilles to his tent and broods," claimed an American expert on China last Friday.

Benjamin Schwartz, a professor of history and government at the East Asian Research Centre at Harvard University, was in Toronto presenting a seminar on "The Maoist Vision: Ideology and Practice."

He told an audience of 50 people that the "vision" of Mao represented the "dialectical interplay" of both Marxist-Leninist theory, and the practical outlook of a skillful politician.

He suggested that "some people pose a false dichotomy" in trying to determine whether Mao is motivated by his ideology, or his objective situation.

Schwartz traced the origins of the Maoist vision to his "Yenan maxims" of 1937, which were generalizations of Mao's own experience. The Great Leap

Historian Benjamin Schwartz

Forward, in the late 1950's he said, was Mao's "finest hour," since these maxims became applicable to the task of economic development.

Schwartz said Mao had to retreat from the Great Leap Forward out of necessity but the program provided "a unique Chinese vision" of economic development.

After the Great Leap, the perspective of Mao and others in China began to diverge, Schwartz said. This was the same period of time the Sino-Soviet rift began which reinforced Mao's vision of China.

The Cultural Revolution began in the mid-1960s stemmed from Mao's desire to change the conscious lives of the Chinese people to prevent China from going down the bourgeois road like the US and Russia, Schwartz said.

He said the Cultural Revolution was the "high point of the Maoist vision," and also showed Mao as a practical politician using the Red Guards to shake up the party structure in China.

However, by 1967, the guards had become too anarchistic for Mao, Schwartz said, so Mao used the army—which Mao felt was a bastion of Mao thought—to re-establish law and order.

The 10th Congress of the Chinese Communist Party last summer generally dealt with preserving the advances of the cultural revolution, he said, adding there is a political movement in China now to retreat from the Cultural Revolution.

The main current in Chinese political debate, he said, is to determine to what extent China should retreat from the Cultural Revolution.

Schwartz, a noted authority on Communist China, is the author of "Chinese Communism and the Rise of Mao Tse-tung," and other works.

Island community's future to be decided soon

By ELEANOR SIMPSON

A proposal that the City of Toronto take back control of the residential portion of the Toronto Islands from Metro has passed through city council and goes before the Metro parks board Thursday.

Bob Katyk, spokesman for Island residents, said they were "handling it with a lot of reserve" but seems at least moderately hopeful that the community will be allowed to stay.

Islanders want jurisdiction of the residential property transferred back to the City of Toronto from Metro council.

Metro gained control of the islands in 1956 and has proposed tearing down the houses to make more parkland. Metro proposals for the parkland have ranged from a Coney Island style amusement park to a wilderness retreat.

The city would preserve the housing.

The jurisdiction proposals will go before the Metro executive on December 4 and the full Metro council on December 11.

A favourable decision for the islanders would mean a happy ending after years of uncertainty following the takeover of the island by Metro on January 1, 1956.

Demolition of homes on the islands began in 1957 and continued until the permanent residents were reduced to about 700 in 1968. That same year, all remaining leases were to be reviewed on a temporary year-to-year basis.

Currently, residents lease the land from Metro and pay rent and taxes for it, but they own their houses on the land.

It is the feeling of impermanence which has caused problems for the residents. Because no compensation would be paid for the houses if the land leases were terminated, residents have been reluctant to undertake more than minimum housing maintenance.

Despite this, only two per cent of the houses are not suitable for renovation. Residents hope that if lease extensions are granted, the houses would be linked up to the Metro parks department proposed $2 million sewer system.

Houses are presently served by septic tanks and holding tanks. Contrary to some reports, these pose no health hazard even during spring high waters, according to Katyk.

Ward's Island, which has a high ground water level, has only holding tanks. Algonquin Island houses have septic tanks as this island is higher.

Last spring, toilets in the homes were declared useable while parks department facilities were closed due to health hazard, Katyk said.

Extension of the parks sewage system would cost an estimated $1.04 million. This constitutes the major portion of capital expenditures anticipated on city-takeover. All residents and tenants, except in one house on each of Ward's and Algonquin Islands, have agreed to accept price controls if lease extension is granted.

A public notice has been posted stating that all transactions in leases taking place after September 1, 1973 will be forfeited.

This would prevent owners from taking unwarranted advantage of the proposed lease extension. Residents realize that without some control, rents would skyrocket as the years of uncertainty have kept them artificially low.

Stiffest opposition at Metro council is expected to come from Scarborough controllers, especially Gus Harris who has consistently voted against keeping the houses on the islands.

Mayor Paul Cosgrove of Scarborough, more community-oriented than his Board of Control, is however a vigorous supporter of the islanders.

The islanders appear to have firm city backing. Ten of the 12 senior Toronto aldermen sitting on Metro Council are expected to vote for the islanders' transfer to the city.

However Ward 6 alderman William Archer, whose ward encompasses the islands, and Ward 8 alderman Frederick Beavis have voted against the islanders before and are expected to do so again.

Residents are discovering that the new land-fill headland is creating further problems.

The Queen City Yacht Club, which stands to benefit from any eviction on Wards Island.

Shifting currents are eroding the island. The beach on Ward's Island has moved one hundred yards and one house was closed because land beneath its foundations was being washed away.

The islands are still a good place to live, according to Katyk. After a quarter of the residents have lived there more than 20 years and some all their lives.

One family contains three generations of islanders, and Fran Ward, descendant of the family for whom Ward's Island was named, has lived there for all his 72 years.

People of the island form an integrated community sharing the problems and benefits of their isolated environment. They provide their own recreational program, and will welcome anyone to their open house on Saturdays and Sundays during the winter.

One house is open each of these days giving visitors a chance to meet the residents over a cup of coffee.

The residential section of the islands takes up about 35 acres or five per cent of the total parkland on the islands. Islanders pay Metro about $45,000 a year to rent the land.

Animal lovers win fur coat

By ANNE HEALY

Two protesters at a Saturday luncheon fashion show for the Grey Cup festival were loudly booed when one of the women won the door prize of a white fox stole.

The two were objecting to the killing of animals to make fur clothing.

Kathy Sims and Marlene Lakin said they accepted the fur only to sell it with the money to go to the Ontario Wolf League and the Society for Animals in Distress.

"Many," the public relations person for the Royal Bank and hostess of the fashion show, said, "It is a debate we can't afford to get into, but her point is well made."

The two protesters were successful in arousing feelings against themselves. They stood at one end of the room holding up their signs: "Real People Wear Fake Fur" and "Our Brothers Are on Your Backs".

After an initial attempt by police to force them to leave, they responded with shouts of "do you want to be charged with assault?". After that the lights were turned off and the protesters were ignored until the winner of the main door-prize was announced.

When the guests discovered who had won the stole, the roared with laughter. They then made such comments as: "What a sin" and "That's sad."

After a long consultation with various members of the head table, the protesters walked away with the prize. The disgusted rumbling of the crowd completely drowned out the closing speech of the fashion show.

Pagnutti breaks scoring records with six Blues capture North Country exhibition title

The Varsity Blues travelled to Potsdam, New York, and came away with all the silverware from the fourth annual North Country Thanksgiving Hockey Festival.

They opened with a narrow 2-1 win over St. Lawrence, bombed Clarkson 7-1, and then roared back with a 1-0 deficit in the third period to blacken the Ohio State Buckeyes 3-1.

Along with the title, Toronto also set a host of individual and team records — nobody is sure exactly how many Don Pagnutti led the parade scoring most goals in a game with five against Clarkson, and most in the tournament with six.

The first game, against St. Lawrence on Thursday, showed Varsity's strong defensive style as they palyed control hockey for 60 minutes. Ivan McFarlane was the hero as he counted both markers, the second coming on a power play. Rookie linemates Larry Hopkins and Ron Harris were also prominent as they assisted on both goals.

Rookie Bob Oss was recalled to play goal, and performed well, handling 25 shots while Blues zipped 45 at the St. Lawrence goalie.

The Friday game featured Don Pagnutti and linemates Kent

Ruhnke and Gord Davies destroying Clarkson, one of the better teams in US intercollegiate hockey.

The opener was Pagnutti from Ruhnke and the first period ended that way, 1-0. The second was Pagnutti from Bill Hews and Davies, Pagnutti from Davies and Chuck Luksa, and Davies from Ruhnke and Pagnutti, just for a change.

In the third, Pagnutti from Ruhnke and Davies twice was separated by Clarkson's goal (by Clarke, who else) and Ruhnke finished the agony with less than a minute remaining on a pass from a dark horse named Roman Kniginzky (that's pronounced Nijinski, as in the famous Polish dancer and choreographer).

The Buckeyes fought for a 0-0 tie at the end of the first and scored in the second to take a 1-0 edge into the final frame.

Blues finally started rolling at 7:52 of the third. Appropriately, Pagnutti scored unassisted to set the tournament record for goals at six.

Less than five minutes later the rookies wrapped it up as Harris scored on a power play, assisted by Hopkins and Luksa.

Hews from Doug Herridge provided the insurance at 14:15 and the defence and Jim Campbell in the nets squelched any comebacks.

Clarkson won its other two games to place second while Ohio defeated the luckless Lawrencians to take third.

In addition to Pagnutti's records, his linemates Ruhnke and Davies also set new ones for number of assists with four each. The three goals against goalies Campbell and Oss was also a tournament low.

Blues face perennially tough competition this Wednesday when they meet Waterloo Warriors in an exhibition game at Varsity Arena.

Breathe easy, your bug is disconnected

While Montreal groups complain about illicit eavesdropping devices bugging them Mother Bell has announced she is going to cut back on the practice.

In an article in the Toronto-based Bell News, the telephone company says "... remote monitoring equipment, installed for use by local management, is being disconnected or removed in some locations.

"The effect of the discontinuance of monitoring will be evaluated in these locations." The article does not indicate where the practice is taking place or being phased out.

Commenting on the federal government's proposed law—now past second reading—to limit wiretapping, Ma Bell says her policy is "to follow to the extent possible what appears to be the intent of the proposed law, rather than simply adhere to the letter" of the law.

However, Bell notes certain exceptions in the anti-wiretapping law, including:

• "a person providing a telephone, telegraph or other communication service to the public who intercepts a private communication;

• "if such interception is necessary for the purpose of providing such service;

• "in the course of service observing or random monitoring necessary for the purpose of mechanical or service quality control checks."

Ma Bell says her official policy on wiretapping has already been offered to the government.

"The company, in fact, has urged the federal government to make wiretapping illegal, both for ethical reasons and because the undermining of privacy impairs the values of telecommunications services."

Bell says.

Meanwhile, in Montreal, five electronic bugs were found in the office of the Agence De Presse Libre du Quebec by employees. The agency publishes the weekly Bulletin Populaire, an alternate news service.

That revelation came hot on the heels of the discovery by two Montreal criminal lawyers that bugs were placed in their law offices. The lawyers claimed police planted the devices, although police have officially denied it.

The federal government's wiretapping bill brought sharp criticism from former Conservative Prime Minister John Diefenbaker on Friday.

"It is unbelievable that any minister could produce this thing, which is of the essence of tyranny and capable of being used to destroy political opponents or others with whom the government is in disagreement."

Queen's pres berates CUA

KINGSTON (CUP) — Principal John Deutsch of Queens University clashed with members of the Ontario Government's Committee on University Affairs (CUA) during their recent visit to Kingston.

Deutsch argued that they must develop a more consistent policy to take the chaos out of university budgeting.

The CUA is the advisory board to the Ministry of Education which recommends the extent to which individual universities should be subsidized. Under their present formula of financing, students in different programs are assigned basic income units of subsidy (BIU). For instance, the grant for each undergraduate arts student is less than that of a science student which is in turn less than that of a graduate student.

"I would hope that the cost of educating a student is never the same at any two universities," Deutsch said. He claimed that universities should be considered individually when funds are distributed, and that the uniformity of the present system forces universities to adopt conforming approaches.

Deutsch suggested that an average BIU figure be established and that universities then be given consideration in light of their objectives. Included in the new system would be an index of university costs, similar to one's being used in Britain and Australia to keep government financing abreast of inflation.

Deutsch also suggested that special consideration be given to universities like Queens which set a target enrollment beyond which they will not grow.

Under the present system these institutions are harmed by inflation as increases in subsidies are tied solely to increases in enrollment.

It appeared that the CUA was caught by surprise. Although committee chairwoman, Reva Gerstein, agreed that a system with pockets of quality should be maintained, she was more concerned with the taxpayer's pocket book. She feared that Deutsch's suggestions despite his claims to the contrary, would lead to excessive autonomy for individual universities. Instead, she suggested subtle balances, which she left undefined.

Blues gain first win, beat Carleton 71-54

By BOB PRITCHARD

Varsity Blues came alive in the second half of play against the Carleton Ravens on Saturday to break a 33-33 deadlock and record their first win of the season 71-54. Blues' league record is now 1-1.

Toronto, who suffered last week from spells of poor rebounding, improved in that department in the first twenty minutes, coming out on top of the Ravens 30-15. But Carleton's 47% shooting average was enough to keep them ahead of the Blues (who only hit 33%) for the greater part of the half.

In fact, it was only a steal by Toronto's Doug Fox, who put the ball through the hoop, drawing a foul and sinking the free throw, that tied the score at 33 going into the changerooms.

Whatever Varsity coach McManus told his charges during that period seems to have stirred the Blues, as Toronto tightened up both offensively and defensively, for the remainder of the game. On the Carleton side of the floor, Varsity worked the ball and set up their plays against the Ravens' man-to-man defence.

Carleton fell short defensively, not only letting Toronto get close enough for a basket, but by fouling them after the ball went through the hoop, giving the Blues a chance for three points.

While Varsity's Rudnik, Filinski and Skyvington were driving to the Ottawa club's boards, Glenn Scott was nothing up the score with some accurate outside shooting, accounting for 13 points in the half.

On the Toronto side of the floor, using both man-to-man and zone defences, Blues kept the Ravens at bay, giving them only outside shots by controlling their own boards. This paid off for Varsity as Carleton only managed to connect a feeble 19% of their shots.

Toronto rookie Doug Fox forced the Ravens to keep their heads up by making several key steals in the Varsity end. These set up some fast breaks for the Blues, giving the team additional scoring opportunities.

Even though Toronto ended up with a 17 point advantage over Carleton, they were up by 24 points at one time. The Ravens managed to shake up the Blues on a few occasions by using a full court press. Varsity, who had little difficulty breaking a better-executed press by the Ottawa Gee Gees, turned the ball over more often to the Ravens, allowing Carleton to reduce Blues' lead.

Toronto, while ahead 20-16 in rebounding in the half, showed supremacy in floor shooting, hitting 52% of their shots compared to Carleton's 19%. Once again, Glenn Scott led the Blues in scoring with 15 points, followed by Rich Kurczyk, who had 13.

Carleton's lack of depth was shown by the fact that only six of their players got on the score-sheet. Drew Love, one of the two veterans from last year's team, led Carleton with 18 points, while rookie Paul Armstrong had 14. TIP OFFS: Blues move to the Ryerson gym to meet the Rams in their next league game tomorrow night. Last year, Blues defeated the Rams in both their meetings.....The next home game is the following night, when Laurier Golden Hawks, who defeated Blues earlier this year, meet Toronto in exhibition play.

That game takes place at Scarborough College.....Carleton's record is also 1-1, as they defeated RMC earlier.

Buyers' guide to cross-country ski equipment

By DOUG CARTER

Prospective skiers, when buying equipment, should go where they can find the best combination of value for their money and good service. Good service requires responsibility for product defects and quick good-quality repairs.

For the beginner skier, complete downhill or cross-country outfits can be had for reasonable prices. Downhill equipment is more innovative, technologically complex and thus more expensive. Cross-country skiing is rapidly growing in popularity due, among other reasons, to better dispersion of people, no line-ups, access to scenic country and the relative cheapness.

In cross-country a reasonable package for the beginner, including skis, poles, bindings, and installation, can be bought for as little as forty dollars. Boots should add another twenty-five dollars or so.

Boots, the most important consideration, should have flexible soles and good quality leather that bends comfortably across the top of your foot when you go up on your toes to push off. Beginners may want an above-the-ankle cut for more support, but the experienced or athletic types will enjoy a low-cut for lightness and greater flexibility. Make sure the heel stays firm when you go up on your toes and the foot doesn't wiggle inside to avoid blisters.

Wood skis are still best in cross-country, usually ash and beech laminations, the better ones including hickory along the bottom and ligna stone edges. The best skis come from Scandinavia, where it all started, although some of the major downhill manufacturers make some good quality ones.

The flex characteristics you look for are as in downhill: soft tip for bump absorption, stiffer tail for tracking, overall medium flex for vibration damping. Beginners need a fairly wide general touring ski (52-56 mm in the middle) to aid stability. This is also good for anyone who goes in unpacked snow, breaking their own trail.

With the thinner light touring skis it's easier to go faster and farther on a trail, but also easier to break them. Fibre-glass are stronger but the base is not as porous and wax-absorbent, steel edges are unnecessary, and "waxless" skis are slow and not generally recommended except for older folks and cross-country snow bunnies.

There are two kinds of bindings: the mouse-trap and the cable. The former is the simplest and most popular, usually consisting of some pins on a plate on the ski which fit into holes on the front of your boot and a 3-pronged clamp. This clamp is attached on either side of your boot to some vertical plates which swing down, catching your sole and attaching to a claw on the front of the ski (You'll figure it out).

This allows maximum heel lift and is very light weight. The cable gives stability both for uncertain beginners and adventurous semi-downhill types by eliminating some of the side-to-side play of the heel.

Bamboo poles should suffice for the beginner. They can break quite easily and care should be taken. In length they should reach from the floor to under the shoulder blades.

Lastly a word about clothing: don't over dress unless you're just out for the scenery; otherwise you can get quite overheated. Clothing should be loose — knickers are popular, to absorb any perspiration.

The women's fencing team advanced to the second round of OWIAA competition at Toronto over the weekend.

McMaster won the event with 19 victories, followed by Varsity with 18 and Western with 11. Individually, Luba Taguchi of McMaster led with 11 wins. Anne Stokes of Toronto came second with nine and Penny Blake of Toronto third with seven.

Mac and Toronto now go into the second round in January at Carleton. The winner represents the central branch in the OWIAA finals sometime in February.

Athletic scholarships triumphed again this weekend in college football. St. Mary's Huskies, dogged by last year's loss to Waterloo Lutheran Golden Hawks, clipped McGill's feathery 14-6 on Saturday for the CIAU title.

For those who prefer sports where skill and not blood is the prime feature, the Hart House Table Tennis Club hosted its all-varsity tournament on the weekend with 30 entrants. John Ngo won the title in an exciting final match against Orlando She. Ken Li took the show spot.

Mrs. Allende calls for boycott of Chilean goods, 2,000 cheer at Con Hall

Hortensia Allende, widow of the late President Salvador Allende of Chile, called on Canadian workers last night to boycott and refuse to unload any goods shipped from Chile in protest of the September military coup.

Mrs. Allende told a wildly cheering audience of about 2,000 in Convocation Hall all credits and loans to the ruling junta should be stopped and all shipments of armaments and airplanes also ought to be stopped.

Speaking through an interpreter, her personal secretary Fernanda Navarro, Mrs. Allende said there is still time to save the lives of thousands of persons being persecuted for their sympathies to the late president's government.

She called on governments to open their doors to refugees from Chile, and "to open the doors of embassies which are closed."

"Numerous eyewitness accounts from Chile have indicated the doors to the Canadian embassy in Santiago are locked and bolted shut to keep out refugees."

Mrs. Allende said refugees in Chile need passports and identification papers as the ruling junta has seized the passports and ID papers from all refugees now in camps set up by the military.

The former teacher said the origins of the September 11 coup which ended in the death of her husband and the overthrow of the first democratically elected Marxist government in the world came from Chilean politicians and American covert interference.

She said a conspiracy of the American Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) and the Chilean Christian Democratic party contributed to strikes which led to the coup.

She also labelled the US International Telephone and Telecommunications company (ITT) as a group which initially tried to prevent her husband's government from taking office.

At the time of the September coup, Mrs. Allende said, the military offered the president a plane and safe conduct out of the country, "but he rejected it."

She said he "died fighting with a helmet on his head and a machine gun in his hand. He died in struggle fighting, but fell as a hero in Chile and Latin America."

Mrs. Allende was allowed safe passage out of Chile to Mexico following the coup and the burial of her husband.

Mrs. Allende is to travel on to Ottawa to speak before the House of Commons External Affairs Committee to plead the case of Chilean refugees and their admission to Canada. From there, she travels on to Montreal, Quebec City, Winnipeg.

She said her trip to Canada "is the duty I have not only as a wife but as a woman who suffers from the tragedy of her country."

She went on to describe the brief three-year history of the Allende government in Chile.

Following Salvador Allende's winning the presidency of Chile in 1970, he took over a country with a $400 million debt and inflation, unemployment and economic inequality.

Copper, which formed about 80 per cent of Chile's foreign income, presented an early economic crisis when the price of copper nosedived from an "organized operation" of foreign firms.

An early signal of things to come, she said, came with the October, 1970, assassination of one of the Chilean generals, which Mrs. Allende termed the "first apparition of fascism in Chile."

However, once in power, he began democratic programs of socialist administration, "convinced he could fulfill the programmes and make better the situation in Chile," she said.

Mrs. Allende told the audience, which mainly consisted of students and academics, that workers students, women, teachers, professionals know Allende "represented humble and working people. He represented the people and they respected him."

Mrs. Allende spoke to a crowd of 2,000 at U of T last night.

She quoted her husband, saying: "I do not have the texture of an apostle. I am a social fighter who fulfills a task that people have bestowed upon me."

She emphasized the intransigent quality of her husband in the face of the September coup when shortly before he said he would not go one step backwards, but would defend the government.

"Only shooting will stop me," she quoted him as saying.

The current situation in Chile was painted in grim terms by Mrs. Allende.

She told of 600 students and teachers found dead shortly after the coup near the presidential palace, of lists of wanted persons read out over the junta's radio station, of the suppression of a free press and trade unions.

She said the junta is lying "to justify the massacres, tortures and robberies" since the coup.

Prior to Mrs. Allende's speech, John Harney, (NDP-Scarborough West), called for the resignation of Canada's Ambassador to Chile, Andrew Ross, which brought a standing ovation, as did Mrs. Allende's speech.

Barnes attacks secrecy of U of T budget

"On the concept of openness, the onus should be on those who close the doors to be able to think through on what grounds to do it. They should see it in terms of agenda items and what the implications are."

So said Committee on University Affairs (CUA) chairwoman Reva Gerstein, commenting on student governor and budget committee member Gord Barnes "minority" report on the U of T budget, given at Monday's CUA meeting.

Barnes was attacking the lack of openness in U of T's budgetary process. He said that "it does not permit members of the community to have significant input and confidence in the budget committee... the process of budgeting at the university takes place in front rooms behind closed doors," he said.

"This medieval practice does not permit free discussion of essential points," Barnes added, but he noted that "to this end... the budget recommendations have recently been liberated and are in the tender hands of the student press—that is The Varsity. This circumstance, I think, is the climax of the unsatisfactory system of budgeting."

Barnes also said that although student representation existed on the budget committee, students still have "no method of expressing their concerns" on the divisional level.

"It is an unfortunate situation when the central budget process permits token student representation and the process at the divisional level (discussing the dispensation of budgets as large as $30 million) excludes students."

"Other sorts of 'priorities' were also established in an unsatisfactory manner. The salary settlement is a good example. Despite the fact that the value of the BIU (basic income unit) increased only five per cent for 1974-75 the increase is just under 10 per cent. This recommendation meant it was very necessary to squeeze divisional budgets (to the extent, I think, of affecting academic programs) as well as to budget for an accumulated deficit of $1,021,000."

"When families' budgets have been eroded by inflation in factors of eight or nine per cent I am sympathetic to the principle of providing relief, but I hardly think that it is so imperative for those with incomes of $20,000 or more. Given that the current average salary of a faculty member of the U of T is $20,600, a settlement of this proportion is cause for concern. It is particularly alarming that it is even possible for those with incomes over $30,000—a sizable group—to receive an increase on the average of $2,500."

However, Barnes, Planning and Resources Committee chairman W.J.D. Lewis and president John Evans were united on the fact that the BIU had to be increased. The basic income unit is the formula used to calculate the amount of money granted to the universities from the provincial government.

Barnes said "the increase in income available to an institution should relate both to growth and the increase in expense related to inflation, so that the current situation where institutions are tempted to expand to cover inadequate increases in the BIU will not exist."

Lewis added that in the last three budget years "the increase in the BIU values haven't been sufficient to maintain competitive salary standards." He outlined several options open to the university system in Ontario:

The first option was to increase the number of BIUs. He rejected this for two reasons: "The University of Toronto is already large and complex, and it's undesirable from the point of view of the U of T and for the rest of the (university) system to increase its size and size of location."

Lewis said the present cost squeeze would have to be absorbed by the university's divisions, a fact which would result in "academic damage, if not now, certainly in the future."

The second option he suggested was to rely on the budgetary process itself to make up for any deficiency in income.

A third option mentioned was to persuade the CUA that the BIU must increase on an annual basis at least in terms of the cost of living. "I believe this is the easy solution," Lewis said.

"I'm not sure as a government appointee that I would have supported this, but my views are changing, and it's a very difficult period ahead over the next four or five years."

Lewis suggested the possible ways to bring in the extra income:

- change the BIU weights,
- develop resource centres in the college subjects and assume equivalent BIU support regardless of the college of registration,

- provide an annual increase in the BIU that does bear some relation to cost,

- if we are to have to do effective long-term planning, we must have a set of government policies,

- the slip-year method has improved immeasurably our ability to look ahead, but there's an inadequate amount of lead time, and it has resulted in considerable damage to the growth areas of U of T—Scarborough and Etirsdale—so much so that their advantages derived from being linked with U of T are outweighed by the cost incurred.

Evans added: "It's very difficult to engage in the planning process particularly where this doesn't involve growth unless you have a fairly clear idea of the planning process ahead. We would be very much concerned if a change in weighting occurred which affected U of T... There needs to be revisions in the formula."

Innis gets residence lease

By DOUG KELK

A 25-year lease for the Innis College student residence was approved by the Planning and Resources Committee of Governing Council yesterday.

The lease guarantees Innis College will have occupancy of its buildings for a minimum of 10 years once the new Innis College is built in the northwest campus.

After a minimum 10-year period, the university may give one year's notice to evict the tenants provided the university pays off the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation mortgage.

However, the Innis College Housing Committee, a student committee, believes the success of the student-community housing project should result in its support by the university for its planned minimum life of 25 years.

U of T President John Evans said he considered the decision to lie primarily with Innis College. "It is a daring program on their part," he said.

Reservations were expressed during the debate concerning the unforeseeable factors during the next ten years.

St. Michael's College President Rev. John Kelly said he wondered at the wisdom of the decision considering the university's hands-off policy for 10 years.

"An interesting question raised here," he said, "is the university's commitment to Innis College."

"What will happen in the case of a bitter dispute between the tenants and Innis College?"

The university can elect to terminate the lease if the co-op is unable to meet its financial obligations, does not perform the obligations under the operation agreement with CMHC to provide low-cost housing to students and families, or does not properly protect and maintain the houses.

The transition from a typical period of 30-days notice to leave to a one-year period after 10 years was described as "innovative" by Rev. Graham Cotter, a member of the Planning and Resources Committee.

Default is defined in the draft lease as the following: failure to pay rent or amounts due as rent under the lease, failure to observe the tenants' obligation under the lease.

The tenants obligations are payment of taxes, maintenance and repairs, conforming to applicable bylaws including housing bylaws, maintaining insurance, payment of utilities, and discharging mechanics liens.

At present Innis College rents houses which are vulnerable to development programs on a one-year lease.

"However, how are we to know what the students living here five years from now will be like?" was the question raised by Kelly.

The proposed housing project will initially cause extensive disruption and dislocation of the present community, most of whom intend to become members of the non-profit housing corporation.

U of T asks for "special treatment" grants

By BOB GAUTHIER

The ghost of decisions past came back to haunt U of T's administration Monday as the university appealed to the Committee on University Affairs for more capital expenditure funds.

Committee chairwoman Reva Gerstein did not express any optimism that the university would receive any such "special treatment" grants before the freeze on capital expenditures imposed last fall is lifted, reportedly sometime in 1976.

Gerstein said "the Roberts Library cost the university much more than money... that's one of the costs that's been paid" in lieu of other buildings. She added that "if the library had been half the size, you would have been in a better situation... it's there all the same."

U of T president John Evans then drove home the point that the university was short on space, forecasting that "we'll have next year's CUA meeting in the machine shop of the Mining Building." At that point another committee member asked: "And will you serve us lunch in the Roberts Library?"

After thanking the member for his comment Evans replied: "a light lunch".

The repartee centred around the close-to-$42 million Roberts research library, originally designed to be a graduate-only library. (In the spring of 1972 student confrontation with the administration led to the opening of the Roberts' stacks to undergraduate students also.)

As the Students' Administrative Council's counter-brief stated: "No more blatant example exists of how the public is excluded from the university than the case of the John P. Roberts research library. This $42 million dollar edifice erected with the taxpayers' money was originally designed exclusively for graduate students and faculty members. But after a prolonged controversy the Governing Council decided that undergraduates would be admitted to the library stacks.

"It took three occupations of Simcoe Hall, the calling of police on campus, and lengthy court cases in which the judge dismissed the credibility of the acting president of the university, but undergraduates were finally admitted."

The SAC brief added that until the U of T administration could show signs of opening an often-bare library to the public its "claim that there is widespread community use of the university can only be considered as at best a half-truth."

Gerstein added later in the day: "We often say we've learned from the '60's (about building space) but have we really? We really haven't found one place (in Ontario's universities) with flexible space."

Business Affairs vice-president Alex Rankin said that "the cyclical renewal allowance scheme is the second most important item on the agenda today, in my opinion, second to the increase in the BIU."

Rankin was supported in his comments by the U of T submission to the CUA which states, "our physical plant is both the oldest and the largest of the Ontario universities." The U of T has once again asked that for "adjustment of the rates of the age-quality and cyclical renewal allowances to more realistic levels."

A capital formula introduced in 1969 provided for funding the construction of space deemed necessary on a per student basis, and because of U of T's many older buildings, the university's inventory in 1969 exceeded the entitlement generated under the formula by about 650,000 net assignable square feet.

The U of T brief states that, therefore, up to the present time Toronto has never been entitled to any capital funding under the interim capital formula other than that generated by the cyclical renewal allowance granted over a two-year period and now frozen.

U of T feels the formula was imposed without consideration of the reality of Toronto's position and that the university is unable to renovate, demolish, or try to adjust to the space limitations imposed by the formula.

Also, the university would like to see a two per cent generation rate of income for each year of building life, instead of the present government imposed rate of one per cent. By U of T's own admission "the cash flow entitlement thus generated will present a formidable total."

The U of T brief recommends that the cyclical renewal allowance and the complementary age-quality discount allowance be generated as follows:

- an age-quality discount of two per cent of the building area for each year of the building's life since construction, for accumulated depreciation and obsolescence up to 1971,

- a yearly allowance two per cent of the inventory value for alterations, depreciation, and obsolescence after 1971.

Still slated for the university's five-year capital program (1973-74 to 1977-78) are renovations to University College, Sigmund Samuel Library, the Wallberg and Sanford Fleming Buildings, construction of Innis College, a new men's athletic building, and a multi-purpose building.

Mrs. Allende says Canada could do more

By MARILYN EMERSON

Madame Hortensia Allende, widow of the late Salvador Allende, president of Chile, hinted at a Toronto press conference yesterday that Canada could be doing more to aid the overthrown elected government.

Speaking through an interpreter, Mrs. Allende said: "The Canadian embassy in Santiago has not to this point opened its doors as it should to refugees, making it difficult for Chileans to make applications" to come to Canada.

Her comment came in reply to a question as to whether Canada should replace its ambassador to Chile, Andrew Ross.

Mrs. Allende also said: "That is the problem of the Canadian government. It is not up to me to say whether he (Ross) has acted favorably."

Asked if she thought Canadians were doing the best they can right now to help, Mrs. Allende was careful not to attack the Canadian Government. She said: "All Canadians must feel responsibility in the overthrow of our government. It was democratically elected."

When questioned about the cables passed between Ross and Ottawa after the coup, Mrs. Allende said she didn't know about them.

Seeing them for the first time in The Variety she commented: "If the declarations in those cables are true, it means that he (Ross) has had very bad conduct as ambassador because he is hiding the truth. But I am not surprised because there are all kinds of ambassadors."

Mrs. Allende threw the question of the cables back on to the press and Canadian people saying their interpretation "depends on you."

Asked about the status of political refugees in Chile, Mrs. Allende said: "They are in the worst possible position. They are in concentration camps not unlike those of Nazi Germany."

She said many Chilean secretaries of state and others have been taken to islands in the Straits of Magellan where "conditions are very bad. There is no housing. Many are ill. It is very cold and some have pneumonia."

Most of the political prisoners are in stadiums living under "inhuman conditions — some tortured, many killed. They are being provided with no care, medical or otherwise. Many have been taken to northern camps where the situation is the same."

Mrs. Allende maintains: "The Canadian government could take more refugees. It is the task of the Canadian people to press the government."

"We are asking all embassies to open their doors," she said. "Many lives can be saved if this is done. We want those seeking refuge to be given humane treatment and documents."

Mrs. Allende said: "Documents have been taken away. What we want is an international campaign for safe conduct for supporters of Allende." Right now, she said, "they stay there in embassies without any chance of leaving. We want Canada to open its doors."

Regarding Canadian aid to Chile, Mrs. Allende recognized grants from the Canadian Government had gone to Chilean institutions. She said: "Our universities are poor," but added, "countries other than Canada have come to the aid of Chile."

"We never received aid from the United States. Canada could have helped with credits. Many countries closed their doors to us," but she said, "we received aid from socialist countries and poorer countries such as Holland, Sweden and Spain."

Mrs. Allende said she did not know the dates or exact amount of credits given Chile by the Canadian government. She said say grants were received prior to and during her husband's administration but that "grants were cut off" after the overthrow in the September 11 military coup.

Moderator Tim Drainin stated: "Mrs. Allende has not had time to check aid credits exactly." She admitted the figures needed checking, but added she did know in 1972 the Canadian government gave Brazil $2.5 million while Chile got what Drainin termed a "cosmetic aid only" of $700,000.

Mrs. Allende claimed the Unidad Popular government (UP) "had good relations with the armed forces. The salaries of the armed forces increased with UP government. The forces were given the opportunity to go abroad, to know other countries and to get better technical knowledge."

"Allende believed in the professionalism of the armed forces. (Allende had admitted four military men into his cabinet). But on June 29, 'Mrs. Allende said, 'the military proved not to be that professional — not so loyal to the government. From then on they started fact escalation ending with the overthrow,' in September.

Mrs. Allende added there was hostility against the government from the beginning. "Allende was aware of the difficulties," she said. She reported that "Congress closed without protest from the Christian Democratic Party," and said

Eduardo Frei, a leader of the opposition Christian Democrats declared, "it was the best thing the armed forces could have done."

"The junta has lied regarding the actual situation and regarding deaths," Mrs. Allende said.

She read a cable from a Chilean reactionary paper which stated the bombardment of palace was not impromptu. It was rehearsed and carefully planned, she said through the interpreter. She said: "The opposition knew of it for a long time, only the UP didn't know, otherwise I would not be a refugee and a widow."

Mrs. Allende stressed the bad conditions in Chile at the present time. "Daily existence is hard. There is still a curfew. No one is allowed out after nine under threat of being killed."

"Inflation is high. There is hunger. Stores are full but there is no money to buy. Workers now work four more hours on Saturday without pay. Salaries are frozen. It is the reverse of what was before."

When asked what methods are being used to carry forward the fight, Mrs. Allende said "there is a 'new resistance'. People are more united than ever. There are no political differences as before."

When asked about a cable from Ross stating tens of thousands of women marched in opposition to the Allende government, Mrs. Allende said "This is true."

She said "the right used women in different occupations. They were also used by the Christian Democrats. These women, she said, 'were from the upper classes living in higher districts, never lacking anything, the ones who had the most money'."

She added, "The pots and pans they carried were new. 'But the working class women were with us. They understood. They always supported us.'"

Slip-year is 'chaos'

Erindale and Scarborough Colleges are caught in U of T's bind of "slip year" financing, a formula tailored to the St. George campus but disastrous to the two "emerging" colleges.

The status of the two colleges was emphasized at Monday's Committee on University Affairs meeting at Erindale College.

Erindale's brief to the CUA states that "the effects of slip-year formula financing on Erindale College have had results contrary to good planning. This is simply because such a scheme could not possibly help a small, post-emergent, rapidly growing institution."

The slip-year formula bases government grants for the 1974-75 budget on December 1, 1973 enrolment. But this is disadvantageous to the two fastest-growing colleges in the U of T system—Erindale and Scarborough. At the present time deficits at the two colleges are compensated for through the St. George campus budget, but the deficits will be held against Scarborough and Erindale and they will be required to pay them back in the future.

The Erindale brief comments that the imposition of the slip-year formula system "was at a time when planning for 1973-74 was virtually complete and it coincided with extraordinary increased costs due to the completion of new plant... The immediate effects of slip-year formula financing was to throw a well-conceived plan into chaos."

"The treatment of Erindale and Scarborough by the Ministry of Colleges and Universities is difficult to understand, particularly since there appears to be no stated policy or knowledge of the criteria that are considered in giving institutions special support over and above that given by the current formula."

In its brief, Scarborough indicated that "the deficits for 1974-75 and 1975-76 are restrained by increasing the number of staff by no more than five per cent per year, whereas the number of students is expected to increase by 14 per cent per year (actual increase of 20 per cent in 1973-74).

Did you say a seven per cent increase?

Library workers headed for small raise?

The recent budget committee recommendations for the 1974-75 academic year do not bode well for the library workers of CUPE local 1230. The union is asking for a 15 per cent increase, and it will be lucky to get anything over 10 per cent at the most.

This is a bitter pill to swallow with the average salary increases for the academic staff set at 9.8 per cent. And at the low end of the salary scales academics will receive as much as a 14 per cent increase if the budget recommendations are followed.

Also, academics beginning at the rank of lecturer are to have their salary floors raised by seven per cent to $10,200 for lecturers, $12,300 for assistant professors, $15,300 for associate professors, and $20,300 for professors.

At the same time the floor for library workers is $4,664 per year, or $88 per week (which averages out to $2.47 per hour during the academic session and $2.66 per hour during the summer when work hours are shorter).

We believe the university can do better than provide a seven per cent increase (or even a 10 per cent increase) for its workers who remain at the bottom of the salary scale. But the administration continues to appease a grasping faculty—who only really put in two-thirds of the calendar year in teaching and class work anyway.

Meanwhile, the library workers slug it out the year round. Not that the academic at this university lives a soft life, but we wonder how carefree the average 'worker' is with the U of T as an employer?

The library workers are now negotiating for a long-overdue settlement to their contract. We think they should take into consideration the budget implications for other staff—both academic and non-academic in this university. They will probably find they're on the bottom of the pile supporting the rest. Many of the library workers are university graduates with BA's or MA's.

Sir George Williams University library workers had to go through a relatively long strike to achieve a better deal, and the McGill University workers struck with the support of students and some faculty members. Perhaps what U of T needs is a strike by library workers to make known their demands in light of the recent 1974-75 budget proposals?

The Sir George workers are now collecting a minimum of $100 weekly after the strike, while U of T workers are still negotiating for such basic working rights as a cost of living escalator clause and a comprehensive health plan, as well as monetary increases.

The library workers have always received the short end of the stick at this university. In February 1971, for example, library worker Pat Garcia was fired for failing to take on extra duties without a pay raise during a period of university 'bureaucratic rationalization.'

Now the university is a bit wiser in how it tightens its belt. The confidential budget report states that "anticipated salary savings will occur during the year which will offset the amount of any proposed grant from the administration to the library itself for salaries. The budget report goes on: "When the savings become clear during the year, transfers should be made from the various salary accounts to the negative appropriation account to the extent of $50,000 (the stated amount of the initial increase). This mechanism will allow the library to increase various salary accounts without increasing its total budget and will facilitate the processing of appointments at the beginning of the year."

Library workers might like to find out exactly what this budget recommendation means before signing the new contract, or, before striking.

CUA 'bitch-in' a joke

U of T's administration really looked like a "bush league" farm team Monday at the Committee on University Affairs meeting at Erindale College. But the CUA was no great help either.

The meeting was little more than the annual 'bitch-in' when the university complains about what it doesn't have and what it needs and the CUA sits politely listening while the real decisions are made within the provincial government bureaucracy.

Not that the CUA is a useless body, but it's rather dubious whether it will transmit the feelings of students with respect to such important issues as tenure and research. It's more inclined to listen to the university's complaints with a bit more sympathy, rejecting student grievances as "internal university matters".

The GSU and SAC members, for their part, helped to embarrass the administration on Monday with their presentation of dissenting briefs, thereby destroying president John Evans' plan for a 'consensus' approach to the meeting. But we would be hard pressed to discover what positive affect the embarrassment will have on the administration's dealings with students.

It did demonstrate the cleverness and ability of students to articulate ideas, but other than that what else has been gained by the annual 'letting off of steam'?

As for the university, it has little hope of making the provincial government for any more money. In fact, one CUA spokesman remarked that the U of T was considered one of the fattest universities in the province.

As committee chairwoman Reva Gerstein remarked on occasion, most of the decisions were 'political' ones; there was little the CUA could do but convey the feelings of the university administrators to the Ministry of Colleges and Universities.

It was a nice exercise in "participatory democracy". The only thing missing was the violinist.

Psych article disputed

In the November 12 edition of The Varsity an interview with me was printed in which a number of facts and many of my opinions were misrepresented. This is a correction of these errors.

The article suggested that social psychology is not presently being taught in the department. This is not true.

I quoted me as saying "students are not in any real position to affect decisions within the department." It is true that if students and faculty opinions are in conflict that the latter will predominate. But, it is also true that many psychology professors are receptive to student opinion and students can persuade the department to change their policies on certain occasions.

The article stated that I had organized a meeting of psychology students last Wednesday. This is not true. The Arts and Science Student Union did this.

Laurie Miller

(Ed. Our article did not suggest that social psychology is not being taught in the department; it merely stated, as Miller pointed out by his statements, that more courses are needed in this area.

Miller admitted to us Monday that his quote on the lack of student input in decision-making in the department was correct but criticized us for not including his other viewpoints. Unfortunately, he did not say anything to that effect in our interview.

Also Miller said he did not organize the meeting. This is also false because he approached the Arts and Science Student Union executive to get support and suggested that a meeting be held. The article did say that ASSU helped by putting up a poster.)

Grad defends Skule curriculum

In view of the most recent battle between Herbert Richardson and the engineers regarding the value of the engineering curriculum, I feel that further description and justification of that curriculum is in order.

At present, all engineering undergraduates at U of T spend between 10 and 20 per cent of their time on "non-technical" subjects. In first and second years, one half-course per term must be non-technical; in third year one full course must be outside the faculty of engineering, and in fourth year one full course is a "free" elective (technical or non-technical). A number of "in-house non-technical electives" are offered to engineers, designed admittedly to fulfill their requirements with a minimal burden placed on the students' limited time. These courses (English, economics, history of science, philosophy of science, science and society, etc.) can be taken at any time in any combination in the four-year curriculum. This is a net improvement over pre-1971 days, when programs were more rigid and the "in-house" choice more limited. Though often considered to be "bird" courses, these electives do serve a useful purpose, providing a welcome change from the bulk of technical study. Of course, those engineers who want to spend the extra effort on something more to their liking can choose instead courses from the faculty of arts and science, and many do. In addition to the "non-technical electives", certain "technical elective" courses, especially in Civil and Industrial Engineering, provide training in topics such as urban planning, management, human engineering and environmental problems.

Tokenism you say? Well, aside from the fact that our scheme compares favorably with most (but not all) engineering schools around, I submit that it offers a more balanced education than many other disciplines; for example, I find it most distressing that despite the current explosion in scientific knowledge, free elective systems such as our "New Programme", which are now filtering down into the high schools, are turning out some graduates with virtually no scientific education at all. In fact, they have a lower level of mathematical and scientific knowledge than was considered acceptable for high school students 20 years ago. Surely in a way these people are more poorly prepared to face our technically-oriented society than the average engineer. Though there is always room for improvement, tokenism on either side is better than nothing at all.

I would also remind any intellectual snobs that most folks still go through life without ever having gone to university, and some of them even make good citizens. Evidently, "human sensitivities" are not all taught on the college campus. We can not all be Harvard PhD's, after all (though I would not be so unwise to suggest, as one of my colleagues has, that we do not need the very real contributions that scholars, even theologians, provide). This is not to say, of course, that engineers should not study in university. As I have pointed out above, we can and do benefit from the scholarship of those in the humanities while we are here, and we would be worse off if denied this privilege. Let's face it: the world needs engineers and it needs scholars and the more we get to know and respect each other the better.

Artist can't be dismissed

With regard to your art review in the "Watsup" column, I feel, first of all, that it is unfortunate that an advertised event, supposedly of interest to readers, can be thoroughly discounted in seven lines.

I am speaking with reference to the notice of the Bertram Brooker, (please note spelling), Exhibition, Varsity, Friday November 23, 1973, page 14.

Perhaps Brooker's work may seem "country-club-cubism" to the uninformed. However, the work is most certainly a relevant, if not dramatic, step of a Canadian artist finding himself struggling with international trends. And despite the fact that it could be labelled "tea-and-crumpit-naturalism", it is without doubt a naturalism of the highest order of craftsmanship. In fact, Brooker is important because he does span these two trends.

In short, Bertram Brooker was a competent artist and relevant to the development of contemporary Canadian Art.

Student protest 'irresponsible'

We hear students have no say in the running of the university. We hear the poor, oppressed undergraduates are hampered by the oppressor state - Simcoe Hall and Queen's Park. Now we hear the discipline code has been delayed because of student protests. This is just another example of irresponsible protest on the part of anarchist-oriented rabble, compounded by the irresponsible reaction of the Governing Council to such ill-conceived protest. Our only hope is we may be more and more like Athens. Student irresponsibility there led to a coup that marked a return to conservative rule. I'm fed up with the terror that reigns over this campus. Where's the War Measures Act when you need it most?

Praises ingenuity of Zimmerman

I was surprised to see how Mr. Zimmerman spoke "for himself" in your article on page 4, November 12 Varsity. He is a very strange man to be able to put himself in the editor's shoes, answer questions and go on to criticize his own responses. Not only can he do these things but he can switch from referring to himself as "Zimmerman" to the usual first person.

If more people wrote letters like Mr. Zimmerman's we could start using Varsity editors as fools instead of the other way round.

C. Gordon
(Ed. Zimmerman's comments were not from a letter but from an interview we had with him. However, we did publish his letter Friday, November 9).

Letters to "Write On" should be typed, double-spaced on a 64-character line, and signed. Contributions may be edited for space reasons. Letters are published according to space available, immediacy of topic, and relevancy. Surplus of teachers helps provincial bargaining position adapted from Community Schools

Remember the good old days, when the run-of-the-mill high school student (read, 'middle class high school student') was advised to go to university, pick up a BA and live happily ever after? After all, if nothing better developed, he/she—but more often 'she'—could always set herself up for life in a 'cushy' teaching job.

Well the good old days have been over for some time. Not only is the BA no longer a sure ticket to a job, but, as University of Toronto's Faculty of Education (FEUT) student handbook points out, "the employment crisis has also hit the more sublime ranks of the educated—the MA's and the PhD's." In 1972 Ontario's demand for Arts graduates was down 38 per cent from 1971; while demands for science graduates were off by 35 per cent.

would-be tenants. A happy medium is best." Faculty of Education dean H. O. Barrett, September 1973.

Who gets the jobs?

In 1971 about 90 per cent of FEUT graduates got jobs; in 1972 this was down to 65 per cent. But by the start of the 1973-74 school year, only 50 per cent of the 1,448 FEUT graduates had jobs anywhere in Ontario.

The Faculty of Education at U of T is not only the largest of the teacher training institutions in Ontario, but its graduates' employment problem is also much more pronounced than that of the graduates who live outside Toronto. Whereas 43 per cent of FEUT graduates found Metro jobs in 1972, only five per cent found jobs in 1973. This results because budget cuts affect metropolitan areas—with their need for special programs for immigrants and others—more than they affect by one ministry spokesman. And the figure for elementary school is higher: 85 per cent of 2,769 1973 elementary graduates have jobs. There were over 1,000 unemployed teachers produced last year, not to mention production in other years.

Nevertheless, only two of the province's 16 teacher 'factories' were shut down this fall—a rare move in itself. The ministry ignored the advice of one of its own committees, which recommended that four places (colleges in Ottawa and Hamilton too) also be closed now. Of course, quotas at the remaining places are to remain untouched.

And the same ministry spokesman quoted above—Walter Mitchell, executive officer in the teacher education branch—is quoted in the Toronto Star (September 10) as saying that he wishes elementary enrolment for 1973-74 wasn't down, because he expects jobs to open up in the next few years.

The ministry's numbers game is much more esoteric than the down-to-earth perception of would-be student teachers. Elementary enrolment is down 25 per cent province-wide, and down 50 per cent at Toronto Teachers College. Both Ministry official Mitchell and TTC principal John Bain agree that the decrease is due partly to the new BA requirement for candidates, but, it's mainly due to would-be candidates' uncertainty about job prospects. "Metro school boards hired no new elementary teachers at all for 1973-74", Bain said recently. "People who got jobs got them in Halton, Peel, Ontario and York counties mainly."

The uncertainty has also spread to FEUT. For the first time in years most people who applied were accepted—even those who applied months late. Thousands were turned away in other years Dean Barrett noted. Of the 2,669 accepted, 675 withdrew before the year began. Last year, only 375 of the 2,417 accepted withdrew before the year began.

Despite decreasing enrolments, however, there will still be thousands of trained teachers in Ontario in 1974-75 who will not get jobs. The budget outline for 1974 is already in. Although ceilings have been raised more than in other years (eight per cent)—a response to the OSSTF's threatened extra-curricular activities boycott province-wide in case of low increases—even education minister Tom Wells admits that his raise only recognizes the no-longer creeping inflation—which strongly affects both school supplies and salaries.

FEUT's student council warned against such problems in a letter it sent out to prospective students (despite U of T administration discouragement) in early July, when only about 35 per cent of 1973 graduates had jobs. The letter stated in part: "Eight months of your life: many assignments, $650 of your money, a year without income; the triple pressures of studying, job-hunting, and practice-teaching. Is the investment worth it?"

One office of the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation (OSSTF) agrees: "It's not fair to young people to have one more year of school under today's conditions; not fair to the public either. It takes $4,000 to train each person at FEUT, and many of them will be unemployed after this money is spent."

Ministry politics: why the budgets cuts?

Why, if teacher training seems to be so badly organized, is something not done about it? What other alternatives are there to the government's saving money by budget cuts—which result mainly in larger classes, as well as in so much teacher unemployment. Former Globe and Mail education critic Loren Lind suggests: "The squeeze on the classroom might have been alleviated if the cuts were made in other ways. For example, the province could have abolished grade 13, lowered the compulsory schooling age, declared a freeze on salary increases, changed the length of the school year, or placed local schools in charge of their own budgets. But none of these things were politically feasible. . . (June 11, 1973)."

These speculations assume for the moment that the Ontario government had no choice, several years ago, but to cut education budgets. We have all been led by ministry propaganda in the papers to believe this, just as, several years ago, we were led to believe in the necessity of building numerous, expensive vocational schools.

The possibility of continuing to spend money on real education needs—like the smaller classes which teachers' federations demand—would not be unrealistic, were the Conservatives not so interested in refraining from taxing the corporations. The corporations' income taxes' share has been the Conservative government fears a voters' backlash on education costs, rather than the sources of funds. warning which the FEUT student council sent out to students "did not present a balanced point of view". He told one Community Schools worker that, "the student council panicked." This from the same person who bumped into a student council officer in the hall one day in early August, and was reputedly happily surprised to find that the student council's returns from 1973 graduates indicated that employment was up to 35 per cent—not 25 per cent as he had thought. He began to use the new figure, obviously not doubting, at this point, the student council's grasp on reality.

The ministry's perspective

The ministry's game is called "pass the buck". For example, Education Minister Wells answers a parliamentary critic on teacher unemployment by saying: "It's not the government's fault that half the people who graduated from Ontario teacher training institutions had not found jobs by mid-June" (Globe, June 23).

A similar attitude is echoed by a minor ministry information officer: "It's their choice. People become engineers; people choose to train to be teachers. Whether they can get a job or not that's a different thing...." Do you think that the ministry has any role in providing jobs for teacher trainees?... No, it's the boards' choice how they spend their money."

And here's another reference to a Wells remark: extracted from The Globe: "The present teacher surplus will continue for a few years, but he expects the situation to end eventually." When?

Are more jobs opening up in the next few years? "I'll believe it when I see it", responds the OSSTF spokesperson we interviewed. "There will be some equilibrium in the 1970s," he adds, "as the budget cuts artificially depress demand (hiring), and supply (enrolment at teacher training institutions) declines accordingly." But not nearly in the numbers (or for the reasons) that Wells or Mitchell are predicting.

And there's another contradiction—between a ministry committee and Wells, Mitchell, and the teachers' federations. Tom McEwan's Committee on the Cost of Education in the Elementary and Secondary Schools of Ontario produced its interim report last summer. It was this committee that recommended the shutting down of our teachers' colleges now—advice which was only half heeded. "Wells said the government would not consider limiting the enrolment of teachers' colleges, even if their graduates cannot find jobs." (Star, June 23) The Globe also quotes McEwan's committee as admitting that 4,370 graduates will be required annually in the next few years. The excess capacity of existing colleges would be 2,175 places annually, then. So what exactly is the rate of attrition in the face of such contradictory evidence?

And the ministry is not about to lift the ceiling to accommodate budget hikes, since the taxpayer is already upset. If the events which preceded the eight per cent hike of 1974 are to serve as a guide, a serious budget hike is not likely without extenuating circumstances.

The scenario for that went something like this:
• Although there is a 23 per cent hike in the ministry's own budget from 1972 to 1973, the 1973 budget for high schools is only up 2.8 per cent from 1972; the 1972 budget was only up 3.8 per cent from 1971, the first year of the cutbacks.

Because the consumer price index had risen 14.5 per cent from January 1971 to the end of July 1973, the OSSTF fears another low budget (for 1974) will barely meet spiralling costs of maintaining basic school services (supplies and salaries). Its executive agrees in late August, that 10,000 high school students can't be wrong. Something isn't right with the education system.

The Variety—Brian Pei

If the high school budget doesn't go up 10 per cent for 1974, it will boycott extra-curricular activities province-wide.

• On August 28, the Ministry of Education announces a 7.08 per cent hike for the 1974 budget. It justifies this to a public to which it had fed the need for more severe budgets, by itself mentioning the rise in the consumer price index. But the real reason was the OSSTF threat: Wells and Metro board chairman Bruce Bone both appeal to the OSSTF to withdraw the threat.

• August 30 the OSSTF calls off the provincial boycott. OSSTF president Dinsmore says "the increased ceilings for 1974 show a belated recognition of inflation." It mentions that the budget hikes will cover problems in all but five districts: Atikokan, Lake Superior, Lennox-Addington, North Shore, and Metro Toronto.

• September to October: first three, then all, Metro Boards' OSSTF leaders say resignation is one tactic considered for the future.

• November 1973: as negotiations with the Metro school board over class size are moving slowly, 87 per cent of Metro high school teachers vote to activate a strike fund. This show of support strengthens the negotiators' hand. They then settle for regaining three-quarters of the staff they lost since 1972. Many teachers, however, show dissatisfaction by failing to ratify the settlement. (And the anger with cutbacks promises further confrontation for 1974.)

Possible solutions to the problem of teacher unemployment

The principal means is to stop the cutbacks. This would improve the pupil-teacher ratio, and the teacher surplus, restore the school supplies and options which are no longer available.

Long-term strategies include:

• Long toward a teacher-student alliance to stop the cutbacks.

• Clarify the issues to those sections of the community which see them only through the often jaundiced eyes of the mass media. For example, look what happened at Metro's Stephen Leacock Collegiate Institute last spring. When teachers booked sick to protest cutbacks one day, they spent the day polling their community (Thomas Wells' riding of Scarborough North) with the aid of students.

• Unite with paraprofessionals—teachers' aides and janitors—who are also hard hit by cutbacks, against the common enemy, the Ministry of Education, and beyond that the provincial government in general.

• Will it be possible to form alliances, on the issue of cutbacks, with the hardest hit boards of education? (Metro OSSTF has asked the Toronto Boards for a guarantee of a return to the 1972-73 PTR by 1974, but no takers so far.)

Specific strategies for ending the teacher surplus include:

• Pressure the government to put quotas on and/or close teacher training institutions, in keeping with real demand. The assistance of associate teachers, students, etc., should be sought.

• Work toward having "closed shop" in the teachers' federations. FEUT Dean Barrett says "It should be the job of professional organizations" to deal with the problems of teacher surplus and class size. An OSSTF spokesperson agrees: "Even professional organizations like the lawyers control entry. We're concerned about flooding the market."

• Consider pressuring the government to guarantee jobs to the people accepted into its teacher training institutions, via pre-selection procedures. ("No government would do this", dean Barrett feels.) And even the OSSTF spokesperson feels "practice-teaching is a valuable kind of screening."

• If necessary, unemployed teachers could form their own organizations. Unemployed teachers could work alongside employed teachers, co-operating on such things as "pink letters," mass resignations, etc., on issues beneficial to either or both groups(s).

If unemployed teachers don't have jobs it's probably because they didn't really look, because of other plans—marriage, travel, or other careers, ministry spokesperson Mitchell said recently. But FEUT dean Barrett supported another view: "The training you get here, whether you teach or not, is valuable—for the civil service, the armed forces, etc." And Canada Manpower has further positive words: Australia is just crying out for teachers—it has 1,000 jobs open.

What women can do if attacked

OTTAWA (CUP) — While only an intensive course in the martial arts (karate, judo, etc.) can give women some insurance against attacks from the general stronger man, here are several hints which may help in time of danger.

—If you are going out alone at night, become familiar with the fire alarm boxes on your route; fire engines usually move fast. All you're risking is a charge of public mischief, which is unlikely under the circumstances.

—Carry a small can of hair spray. Keep it accessible, say in your coat pocket. The spray will immobilize them temporarily, if you hit them in the eyes.

—Or, follow the suggestion of a gay protective squad in California which advocates carrying small spray cans of red paint.

—To assure a reaction, if you are attacked and are near an office building or apartment block, yell "FIRE" rather than "HELP". People's apathy usually hasn't reached the point of ignoring such a call.

—Do anything you can to harm him.

—Do not use or carry a weapon which could be turned on you.

—If you have been sexually assaulted:

—Report the rape immediately to the police and subject yourself immediately to a doctor's examination at a hospital. Reporting the rape may be embarrassing and degrading but you owe it to other women —Do not expect any sympathy; police are men first.

—Expect to be questioned like a criminal—you must prove you have a case. Also expect totally irrelevant questions about your personal life.

—In court it will seem as if you and your vagina are on trial.

—Dropping the case is condoning the rape. Expect friends and family to urge you to drop it but do not give in.

If women refuse to be intimidated by the hospitals, police and the courts, rape will lose its stigma and the rapist will lose his best defense against arrest and conviction.

Artistic talks stalled

Contract talks between the Artistic Woodwork Company and the Canadian Textile and Chemical Union (CTCU) stalled yesterday following management's refusal to take back any strikers arrested during the strike.

A CTCU spokeswoman said yesterday among those refused were two workers whom management claimed "should have been arrested but weren't."

CTCU has been on strike at two

Artistic plants in North York since August 21 in an effort to win a first contract.

The major obstacle to contract talks at first, was a strong management-rights clause which the company insisted upon.

The long and bitter strike which ensued has resulted in many mass pickets and more than 110 arrests.

Most arrests have involved minor charges. Of the people arrested during the strike, 11 were workers, the rest supporters of the strike.

The union has reached a compromise on the management-rights clause. The most abusive aspect of this clause which would have allowed management to dictate rules and arbitrarily fire workers, has been removed from the contract.

A CTCU spokeswoman said management is now trying to impede talks again by refusing to take back those strikers who were fired.

THE JOHN P. ROBERTS RESEARCH LIBRARY

APPLICATIONS FOR CARRELS AND BOOK LOCKERS WILL BE ACCEPTED
UNTIL DECEMBER 9TH.

The Circulation Department on the fourth floor of The John P. Roberts Research Library will have revised application forms available for all who wish to apply for carrels and book lockers for the second half of the academic year. Everyone wishing to be considered for a carrel and or book locker must apply on a revised form after the appearance of this advertisement. Present carrel holders must vacate their carrels and or book lockers and return their keys on or before January 11th. After that date, all material will be cleared and the carrel and locker spaces reassigned.

Completed applications should be returned to the Circulation Department no later than December 9th. Applications received after this date will be considered only in the unlikely event that there are still carrels available.

The collections in the Roberts Library serve primarily those graduate students whose departments are included in Divisions I and II of the School of Graduate Studies. The majority of carrels will be assigned to these students, although students from other Divisions whose work centres on the collections in the Roberts Library will also be considered.

The following priorities have been agreed on with the School of Graduate Studies:

1. full-time doctoral students in their final year or residency or beyond
2. other full-time doctoral students
3. full-time masters students
4. part-time doctoral students
5. part-time masters students

Within these general priorities the appropriate graduate departments will be asked to establish individual priorities which they will communicate to the Library.

When the Library has received the lists in order of priority from the departments, each applicant will be asked by mail to come to the Circulation Department so that a carrel/book locker can be assigned. A deposit of $5.00 will be required for the key to a lockable carrel, refundable when the key is returned.

At present there are not sufficient lockable carrels to accommodate even those students in the first priority. There are some 600 lockable and open carrels available now. We hope to have further lockable carrels available shortly. There are also available some 1,100 book lockers.

Reprieve for car dodgers, stoplight deferred

By TOM GRAND

The Metro transportation committee deferred a decision Monday on the location of the Queen's Park Crescent stoplight until its January meeting.

However it did recommend traffic lights be installed at the north end of the crescent to provide an east-west crossing.

Discussion on the issue was put over to January at the request of the University of Toronto city liaison committee studying the proposal.

The original plans called for traffic signals at the Hoskin-Queen's Park intersection. Since 1971 there have been 21 vehicle collisions caused by a weaving movement of traffic on the crescent.

The committee argued traffic signals at Queen's Park Crescent West and Hoskin Avenue would aggravate this accident potential by making it more difficult for west bound traffic to enter Hoskin.

The committee felt that a signal at the north end of the crescent would probably reduce the number of accidents at the approach to Hoskin Avenue.

It would also serve pedestrians crossing the north end of the crescent and increase the gaps in traffic flow thereby improving student crossing opportunities at Hoskin.

SAC vice-president Steve Moses, student representative on the liaison committee studying the issue, claims the Hoskin-Queen's Crescent crossing would be more convenient for students and would not cause an increase in vehicle accidents.

Ward 6 Alderman Bill Archer says there could be a signal crossing in by the spring if a decision is reached in January's committee meeting.

For years, U of T students have been dodging in and out of traffic to cross the west end of the crescent.

The January transportation committee meeting, according to Archer, will receive a report from Metro transportation commissioner Sam Cass recommending whether there should be a traffic light installed.

Cass is currently supervising a study of Queen's Park Crescent to determine if a traffic light is needed.

The standards his study uses to decide if the light is needed are far from simple. The roads' experts have five categories to assess, including: minimum vehicular volume, delay the light would cause to cross traffic both pedestrian and vehicular, minimum pedestrian volume, the accident hazard of the intersection, and a combination factor of the first four.

For Queen's Park, Cass' crews will have some pencil scratching to do, for the standards set up for the five categories only cover two kinds of roads: two-lane roads, and roads four to six lanes.

The problem is that Queen's Park Crescent is three lanes wide in north section.

Students can enjoy dodge 'em cars until at least January.

Once the study of the traffic flow is done, the conclusions are still not final.

Cass says the standards "are not absolute, and must be tempered by professional judgment and experience; however in most instances, they provide for a reasonably accurate assessment of the requirements for traffic control signals at any location."

While many students, as well as representatives at the city-university liaison committee, hope a traffic light will cut down the possibility of accidents on Queen's Park, Cass says that is not the primary purpose of such a light.

"Recent discussions at the transportation committee would seem to indicate a feeling that the primary function of traffic control signals is that of preventing accidents and I would point out that such is not the case," Cass says.

"The primary function of traffic control signals is to assign the right-of-way to conflicting movements, whether these consist of vehicles or pedestrians."

"In many instances, the installation of a set of traffic control signals results in a higher incidence of accidents than that which existed prior to the installation."

Queen subway best for Toronto, TTC says

By PAUL McGRATH

Metro council and the Toronto Transit Commission seem to be a little at odds over the best solution to transit problems in the city.

The TTC has been pushing the Queen Street subway idea for a while, but on Monday Metro council decided to postpone any decision on the matter until Richard Soberman, director of the Metropolitan Toronto Transportation Plan Review Committee, could have sufficient time to explain to council how a subway system further north, preferably on Eglinton Avenue, might better serve the city.

The difference of opinion stems from two different ideas of what the city core is and should be.

The TTC feels that a new subway line should serve the downtown core, which continues to expand with the new Fairview, Commerce Tower, and T-D Centers, and that the Queen St. line would do that job most efficiently.

What the TTC might be overlooking is the job of Soberman's committee, which is to come up with new ideas on development and transportation.

Soberman, as well as trying to re-work transportation recommendations in the city, is also thinking of ways to shift development from the core and lessen the demand for downtown development.

That is bound to sit right with city council, which is facing loads of trouble from developers after its height-restriction law on downtown development earlier this fall.

Soberman has a few other sympathizers, especially the Borough of North York, which asked earlier this year that an Eglinton subway line take priority over a Queen Street line. As a result of this, the TTC requested a report on passenger volumes on the two routes.

These reports only reinforced the TTC idea: "It will be noted that passenger usage along Eglinton Avenue is highest at Yonge Street, but that it drops rather drastically east and west of this point. Passenger flow along the Queen corridor however, is much more sustained."

Furthermore the report says, because of the fast pace of downtown redevelopment, with most major downtown corners scheduled for a large project, "it is believed essential that an additional transit line be constructed into this core area."

The commission also maintains that the plan would take a lot of pressure off the present Bloor-Danforth line as well as easing traffic problems on the north-south line that usually occur at Bloor station.

Given this, the commission decided that the Queen Street route was the best, according to their priorities. The commission is going ahead with reports on suggested alignments, cost estimates and a construction timetable while waiting for a Metro decision.

Soberman has a big job ahead of him to convince Metro council and the TTC of the need for re-evaluating transportation priorities.

One side is thinking into the city while the other is thinking of development that will take pressure off the core.

No evictions for cop shop

After weeks of volleying back and forth at each other, Metro and City Councils have finally decided where to put the new 52 Division police station—at the corner of Dundas and St. Patrick Streets on a parking lot.

Metro originally had wanted to rip down houses on Beverley Street near Dundas for the new station but met with stiff community opposition to the idea.

The city, however, wanted the St. Patrick Street location to prevent the demolition of the homes. The two levels of government haggled it out for weeks, but the stumbling block finally got dislodged last week.

The city gave Metro the St. Patrick land, and in return Metro gave the city the Beverley Street land. On paper, the city lost about $1.5 million in giving up the old St. Patrick parking lot.

The St. Patrick site is valued at $2,485,000 and the Beverley site is valued at $996,000.

However, city alderman William Kilbourn said the loss of dollars on paper was worth it because of the "social benefits to be gained by the exchange."

But the city's budget chief, alderman Art Eggleton, termed the exchange "a bad economic deal for the city. All we get is 10 houses in pretty poor condition".

Ward 6 Alderman Dan Heap, who represents the residents living on the property involved, said the original Metro idea of Beverley Street represented an example of institutional block-busting.

With the city now owning the Beverley Street houses, the city is committed to leave them up rather than develop them, which was the intent of the land swap with Metro.

"I cannot see this council selling it off and going into the development business", Kilbourn said. "I cannot see this council breaking its own holding bylaw and going for a massive commercial development which would be totally unacceptable".

GSU questions province's concern with its program

The Graduate Students' Union joined with the U of T administration at Monday's Committee on University Affairs meeting at Erindale in asking for further provincial funding for graduate student incomes.

However, the GSU brief notes that some of the blame for the present unsatisfactory situation (in GSU eyes) lies with the budget committee of the university's Governing Council.

Pointing to the Advisory Committee on Academic Planning's assessment recommendations to markedly restrict the number of PhD programs in certain courses, the GSU asks if the province actually wants to maintain and expand the current level of graduate education or decrease it. The present policy, says the GSU is leading to a decrease "by forcing students either to switch from full-time to part-time attendance or to drop out temporarily or permanently."

"Students are not leaving school because they do not like it any longer, but because they cannot afford it," the GSU submission states.

The GSU position also states that all restrictions on graduate programs should be looked at very closely, implying that undergraduate teaching will suffer from a decrease in the availability of graduate students to teach undergraduates.

"At the University of Toronto 40 per cent of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences Faculty is done by graduate students at a rate of pay much lower than that of a full-time faculty member."

The GSU also wants the province to guarantee every full-time graduate student $3,000 per annum "until the end of, at least, one post-residence year, and it should do this without causing a decrease in current enrolment — either by turning more money over to the university, or making up the difference between fellowships and $3,000.

The GSU believes that "in the light of today's prices this is a very modest request indeed."

Dodgers evade Hookers, win touch, Vic I leads b-ball

By CHRIS ROBINSON

The dodgers laid the Hookers 21-12 in the deciding game of the touch football championships to take home the title.

Both teams exhibited excellent passing from Hookers' Larry Rotstein and Dodgers' Nelson Savein. There were some fumbles, but an amazing number of receptions for the muddy, rainy conditions.

The scoring started slowly, with Shelley Sinukoff insinuating himself to give the Hookers a 6-0 lead. Just before the half Steve Herman tied it up, catching a pass in the endzone. Jack Onrot promoted a convert to rock Hookers with a 7-6 deficit.

Early in the second Hookers' Laurie Shute fired around the outside for a long gain. Bob Waller capitalized on a short post pattern, but the convert was missed.

Dodgers lost little time on their next series as they marched down the field to paydirt without losing possession. Barry Kurtzer found himself clear in the endzone, and Tom Bacher snared the convert to put Dodgers out in front for good.

Rotstein wasted little time, using mainly outside patterns and long passes to carry them into striking range. A successful third down gamble to Sinukoff appeared to have the Dodgers in trouble with the time running short.

The defence held, as Rotstein was caught for a loss and then overthrew his receiver in the endzone. On third down, Onrot rushed on and deflected a labelled pass to force the turnover.

With four minutes to go Herman started catching everything in sight. When Savein fumbled and had to fire a bad pass Herman reeled it in with one hand before falling flat on his face.

Eventually one of them was in the zone for his second TD and the end of the Hookers' hopes. Peter Goldfarb nabbed a hard pass to finalize it at 21-12 as time ended.

The entire game was an exciting spectacle of long passes and diving catches. The only casualties were a dozen mud-encrusted UTAA jerseys, proving that touch football is more than just a poor man's alternative to tackle.

By BOB PRITCHARD

In first division volleyball action, Knox recorded their fourth win of the season, shutting out PHE 15-0 and 15-0. Eng II slipped by defending champ Eng I in the standings by clipping Meds 15-4 and 15-10.

The Variety—Bob Pritchard

Architecture forward gets clear shot on the way to beating Dents IV year 3-1.

In the second division, New won their fourth and fifth games, defeating both Vic III and For B in two games straight. But Vic III came back in their next outing to win against Eng III by 16-14, 10-15 and 15-13 scores. Eng III picked up a win earlier when Vic II defaulted.

St Mike's and Pharm maintained their winning ways as the men in blue defeated Erin II in three games, while the pharmacists dumped Innis 153 and 15-0. In other games, For A beat their For B brothers 15-3 and 15-9, while Grads took Law 16-14 and 15-7.

This week marks the end of regular play in Div II. Those teams who have maintained a 50% or better record will qualify for the double elimination playoff tournament, starting January 15. To date, teams meeting this criterion are: St Mike's Pharm, New, Grads, Trin, For A Eng II, Erman, and For B.

Vic I remains at the top of division IA, in basketball, with a 70-50 victory over Law I and a 59-58 nipping of PHE A. Dave Watt led Vic in scoring on both occasions with 14 and 17 points respectively.

Close behind is Sr M A, who handed Law their second loss of the week 76-50, and then contributed to PHE A's third loss in five days by defeating them 56-51. Trafford had 19 for SMC in that game, while Campana hit for 16 against the Lawyers. Med A took Sr Eng 77-59, while UC I dumped PHE A 80-63.

In the B part of the division, SGS has somewhat of a hot streak going, recording their fourth win in as many starts by trouncing PHE B 92-59 yesterday. Fjeld, who totalled 28 and 29 points in earlier outings, notched 41 points in that performance. In a previous win, the Grads defeated New A 70-61. Johnson had 21 points for the winners that time.

Scar came up with their first win of the season, taking PHE B 55-44 with 17 points from Lichtfuss, while Poplichak had 18 for the losers.

Wright's 29 points combined with Foster's 23 led Trin A to their first victory, downing New A 84-62. Trin however, bowed to PHE B 59-49 later in the week. Once again, Wright led Trin with 24 points, while Lorenz had 18 for the Jocks.

In Div II A, PHE C made it three for three by taking St M B 33-25 and UC II 48-40. Vic II picked up two wins, handing the same two teams losses of 41-18 (over UC) and 38-30 (over St M). Quackenbush had 13 points for Vic in the latter contest.

For A beat Jr Eng 49-28, while Dent A nipped by Mgt Stud 41-40. Lederman led the winners with 13 points, while Barnes had 16 for the losers.

In the B half, Dent B picked up their second win, handing Med B their second loss, 47-25. Pharm A took Innis 59-48 with 13 points from Vaicius, while PHE D defeated Law 30-21, and Trin B doubled New B's score with a 42-21 victory.

Sharp wins CIAU cross-country

Neither rain nor snow could keep John Sharp from his appointed CIAU and Ontario victories.

The women's ice hockey team came up with another win over the weekend, defeating Western 4-3 in a game that saw the Blues play their toughest game this season. Not only were the Blues trying to beat Western, but they also had to contend with the referees who obviously were watching some other game.

The Blues took a 1-0 lead midway through the first period with Angela Combs scoring, but in the last seconds of the period Western put one past Lou Attallah to tie it up.

Combs made it a hat trick with two more goals in the second period to put the Blues ahead 3-1 going into the third period.

In the final period Western was able to capitalize on some bad passes in the Blues own end. Val Bush got her long-awaited goal early to make it 4-1 but Western came right back with a disputed goal that we're still waiting to go in.

Toronto, rather upset at the call, got served with a bench minor but were able to hold off Western until late in the period when they shoved one in to make the final score 4-3.

On Friday the team travels to Queen's.

Brock University hosted the first round of the OWIAA intermediate volleyball competition, but Toronto women walked off with undefeated honours.

They shutout Trent, Brock, Ryerson and McMaster in straight sets 3-0. Queen's proved to be harder going as they lasted the distance before bowing 3-2.

Those of you who watched the Grey Cup game on television may have noticed the sign held up by some Edmonton fans: "No Grey Cup/No oil". Don't laugh. Don Getty is the appropriate minister in Lougheeds cabinet, and he used to be better known as the quarterback of, you guessed it, the Edmonton Eskimos.

Varsity harrier John Sharp won the CIAU cross-country title last weekend in Kingston to cap a fine season in which he also took home the individual honours in the provincial meet in Sudbury and placed fourth in the Canadian senior championships.

Interference in GAA drive charged

By BOB BETTSON

The Graduate Assistants Association got the support from a veteran labor organizer who charged yesterday the U of T Staff Association with "interfering with the legitimate efforts of a union to organize."

Canadian Labor Congress regional director Harry Simon was reacting to this week's UTSA membership drive which involved the mailing of applications to all paid employees of the university, including teaching assistants.

This comes at a time when the GAA is approaching the end of a successful drive toward gaining certification as a bargaining agent, according to GAA president Michael O'Keefe.

The membership application sent out by the UTSA says "the UTSA speaks on behalf of its members concerning salaries, personnel problems, Governing Council issues and generally working conditions. It also sponsors social events."

However it says "UTSA is not a union. All employees of the university are welcome to join. The larger our membership the stronger our voice. UTSA needs you and you need UTSA."

O'Keefe said yesterday the GAA is not interested in "anything less" than being a legally certified bargaining agent and union for teaching assistants. He explained that a voluntarily recognized association like UTSA is not a "viable" organization.

However, the GAA has won another important battle with the university over the release of a master list of all graduate teaching assistants at U of T.

After a Varsity editorial and story revealed that the U of T administration was dragging its heels on releasing the list, O'Keefe said the university's attitude changed.

"The administration contacted us after the article and at a meeting with Brown and Conway, they were quite nice," he said. "They wanted to establish a working relationship."

R.F. Brown is university personnel director, and Jill Conway is vice-president in charge of internal affairs.

O'Keefe was "doubtful" if it was just a coincidence that the UTSA membership application went out just as the GAA is reaching the climax of its organizing drive.

He called UTSA a "company union," adding "it is not a viable organization. I don't think anyone would pay a dollar a month to join."

The fee for joining the GAA is only one dollar which is a once only payment.

UTSA president David Priddle admitted yesterday UTSA's membership is more than 600 and said: "I don't know of any teaching assistants that are members."

UTSA's membership is open to any employee of the university but in practice Priddle said: "Our main interest is the non-academic staff."

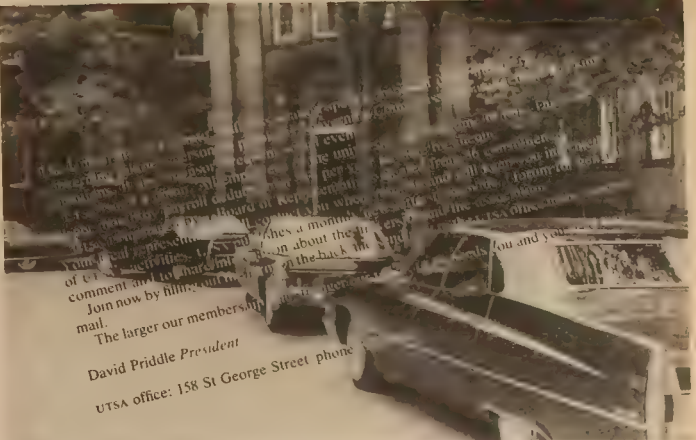

He claimed UTSA had paid for the mailing in advance. The applications were sent out with pay stubs this week through the university payroll department.

The membership drive, according to Priddle had been planned since early this summer, and it "just happened" the applications were sent out this week.

Though Priddle said the UTSA is not competing with the GAA, O'Keefe said "the university would like us to become like the UTSA."

Brown said the university has officially recognized the UTSA whereas the GAA is not recognized.

Like the U of T Faculty Association the UTSA clearly states it is not a union. Legally therefore it is not a bargaining unit although it does make representations on behalf of its members.

He confirmed UTSA had requested the mailing "a long time ago" but waffled on the question of the GAA getting the equivalent privilege.

"It is an open question how far the university should assist the GAA in its drive to unionize," he added. "It would be quite reasonable for the university not to go too far."

O'Keefe said Brown was the official GAA contacted October 22 to request the master list. Brown did not reply and finally the list was released only after this week's meeting.

Conway said yesterday "there was never any decision not to release the list." She claimed a great deal of work had to be done to collect the information the GAA required.

The GAA needs the list because it is the only way to determine the exact number of teaching assistants working at the university. The GAA needs to sign 35 per cent to make a formal application for a certification vote.

The U of T administration is finally starting to co-operate with the GAA according to O'Keefe. The GAA will be having a further meeting with vice-president and provost Don Forster and Conway in the near future.

However O'Keefe said the university has still not agreed to pay the teaching assistants the legally required four per cent vacation pay. There is a hearing Monday to reopen investigation of a GAA complaint concerning the administration's refusal to back down on back vacation pay.

He revealed in other universities teaching assistants have had their pay lowered by the amount of vacation pay they had coming to them. Teaching assistants are not organized anywhere else in the province.

The association has already signed up 700 members and is hoping to gain close to 50 per cent or about 1,000 before the vote.

Teaching assistants, the GAA says, are responsible for more than 40 per cent of undergraduate teaching and receive an average wage or less than $1,000 per year.

Wages range from $500 to $1,800 "and that's for the same amount of work," O'Keefe said. In contrast the University of Windsor association which has been recognized, has won a uniform $2,400 wage, a grievance procedure and a voice in departmental hiring committee.

Repeal closer: Morgentaler

Dr. Henry Morgentaler described his acquittal on abortion charges as a "symbolic" defeat of Heather Morris' Crusaders for Compulsory Pregnancy during a Wednesday speech.

Speaking at a capacity audience at St. Lawrence Centre, the Montreal physician said the recent court case would force English-speaking Canadians to revise their view of Quebec as popishly dogmatic and backward.

He said his victory in court would give further stimulus to the movement to repeal the current abortion laws in Canada.

"Humanism is my philosophy of life," Morgentaler stated, and he spent a good portion of his speech talking about "good conscience" and the "individual's responsibility to society."

He responded to one argument put forth by the anti-abortion Right To Life group, which had about 30 representatives at the speech, who claim all unborn fetuses have a right to live.

Morgentaler countered since an average man can father more than 1,000 babies in his life-time the logic of the Right-to-Lifers dictates that a group should be set up to save spermatozoa from being killed.

A jury of 11 men and one woman acquitted Morgentaler in Montreal earlier this month of a charge of performing an illegal operation.

Morgentaler's defence was based on a clause of the Criminal Code which had never before been used in an abortion case. The Crown is appealing the decision.

Another speaker, NDP MP Grace MacInnes, told of the laughter and jokes the male Members of Parliament lost in her direction anytime she has tried to seriously discuss abortion in the House of Commons in Ottawa.

She urged that men sympathetic to the abortion repeal movement write their members and help in delegations to MPs.

The third panelist was Florence Kennedy, a black feminist lawyer from the US. She said anti-abortion advocates were the same people who supported napalming children in Vietnam, no amnesty for those US war resisters who refused to napalm, and capital punishment for convicted criminals.

Acquitted abortionist Dr. Henry Morgentaler, spoke last night.

Gregory denounces gov't 'tokenism'

By JANE WATERSTON
Recent recommendations of an Ontario legislature committee for the regulated and government-supervised Canadianization of Ontario universities are felt by SAC rep. Rick Gregory to be "very parochial" and "tokenistic measures of nationalism".

The report, presented Friday by the province's select committee on Economic and Cultural Nationalism, calls for legislation requiring all heads of departments, deans, vice-presidents, presidents, boards of governors, and university chancellors to be Canadian within five years.

It also recommends enforced 80 per cent Canadian hiring for seven years unless the universities substantially increase the percentage of Canadians on their teaching staffs within the next three years.

Figures for 1972-73 reveal that of the total faculty at the fifteen Ontario universities, 64 per cent were Canadian, a 1.7 per cent increase from the previous year.

The Ontario Human Rights Code, which forbids discrimination in employment on the grounds of nationality, would be violated by the proposals of the committee. The group feels, however, that the code should be amended to allow for a policy which would increase the Canadian content of Ontario university teaching staffs.

The committee says hiring preference should be shown towards Canadian citizens who have done most of their graduate training at Canadian graduate schools.

It adds the capacity of graduate programs should be improved in all major disciplines. Graduate schools should also develop courses and programs of special importance to the understanding of Canada.

The report has resulted from what the legislative committee feels to be the careless recruiting and lack of sensitivity to matters of Canadian importance prevalent in Ontario universities.

Gregory feels the implementation of the group's recommendations would seriously cramp the autonomy of the universities in question.

The movement to develop a course content which will more fully reflect this country and its concerns is commendable, says Gregory, but the government in principle should not dictate hiring policy to the universities.

SAC campaign labelled "systematic innuendo"

SAC and the Graduate Student Union are accused of "a systematic campaign of innuendo and misrepresentation" against the discipline code in a document prepared for Governing Council by five key members of the administration and faculty.

The document says that "it is our strong feeling that in large measure the concern" by students over the discipline code's implementation is due to the SAC and GSU "campaign."

The document, which is to be presented as a letter to Governing Council is signed by J.E. Dove, chairman of the Academic Affairs committee of Governing Council; R.M.H. Shepherd, professor of classics and former Academic Affairs chairman; J.B. Dunlop, Governing council member (vice-chairman of External Affairs) and law professor; John Swan, law professor; and Marnie Paikin, chairwomen of Governing Council's Internal Affairs committee.

The letter includes a photocopy of a SAC-GSU leaflet criticising the discipline code, and in a point-by-point rebuttal, claims the leaflet is "grossly unjust," "grossly misleading," "absolutely untrue," in various places.

The leaflet says the code is an "attempt to legitimize unjust arbitrary and discriminatory procedures against student," to which the letter replies:

"The persons concerned worked conscientiously and in good faith to make the procedures as just and undiscriminatory as possible towards all members of the university community..."

The letter says the SAC-GSU leaflet "is not only totally wrong but is also a slur on the integrity of the persons who have worked on the proposals."

The leaflet criticised the adoption of the code last June when students had left the campus for the summer after appearing in April "too late in the year for students to respond."

The letter replies that work toward the code was begun in 1968 and the present document began being prepared in the fall of 1972.

"Students were members of all the Governing Council committees and task forces concerned with this work," the letter says. "Successive versions of the proposals were made available to student organizations and to members of the university for comment."

"Comments, proposed revisions, and other representations from student groups were received, considered, and in many cases adopted, right up to the time of the adoption of the code by Governing Council in June, 1973."

The student leaflet says that tenured faculty cannot be prosecuted under the code, action against such faculty must occur in secret and that the administration refused to alter the arrangement.

The letter from the faculty-administrators terms this "untrue" and "misleading" saying that faculty members "can" be prosecuted under the code, but if the offence would result in dismissal of the faculty member, then the university administration could pluck the issue out from under the code and have the faculty member tried by the Haist rules.

No tenured U of T faculty member has been fired under the Haist rules.

The letter says Haist proceedings are in public unless either the faculty member or the university request them in private.

Proceedings under the code, according to the letter, "will normally be public, but the (discipline) tribunal has power to proceed in private if considerations of public interest or confidentiality of details of penal affairs require a closed session."

The letter also says while Academic Affairs committee is considering whether Haist proceedings should or should not be public, "there appear to be serious legal obstacles to making such a change."

The letter justifies the overlapping of such offences as theft and vandalism in both the criminal code and the university's discipline code by explaining that what may be a relatively minor offence for the public at large, such as petty theft, can be a serious offence in a university if the theft involved something like experimental data for a graduate thesis.

The letter also justifies theft from the library being under the discipline code as being necessary "in order to exclude him or her from the library for the protection of other users."

The signatories to the letter, who include two law professors, did not mention that in criminal court the judge may order a person convicted of theft not to enter the premises where the theft occurred.

Metro stalls as U of T student injured

By MARILYN EMERSON

Wet pavement saved the life of U of T student Isabelle Mikosza on Wednesday night as she was hit by a TTC bus while crossing Queen's Park Crescent on her way to Trinity College.

In drizzly weather, about 5:30 pm (the worst time for traffic accidents), she made a dash for the south bound curb of the crescent, and apparently failed to see an oncoming southbound TTC bus.

A glancing blow from the side of the bus caused Isabelle to skid backwards on wet pavement and miss the wheels of the bus.

Taken to hospital in critical condition, she was operated on for a spleen removal, and for stitching of large gashes in the liver.

Isabelle spent the night in intensive care and is now reported in satisfactory condition at Toronto General Hospital.

It is estimated she will be in hospital for about two weeks. Recovery period may put her out of the running for winter sport and term work. A second year student majoring in french at Trinity College, she is a member of the U of T ski team.

At the time of the accident Isabelle was returning from a meeting to discuss a study year abroad. She is planning to go to France next year.

For months, to facilitate the stream of west bound students crossing Queen's Park Crescent, appeals have been made to Metro transportation committee to install traffic lights on the crescent. No action has been taken to date, although various recommendations have been agreed on in principle.

Since 1971 there have been 21 vehicle collisions caused by a weaving movement of traffic on the crescent.

Metro transportation committee has approved the idea of lights but has deferred its decision on the location until its January meeting.

Two locations have been proposed. The original plan called for traffic signals at the Hoskin-Queen's Park intersection. The other plan recommends lights be installed at the north end of the crescent to provide an east-west crossing.

Metro transportation commissioner Sam Cass admitted accident prevention is not the primary purpose of traffic lights. TTC policy seems to indicate interests are with traffic flow more than with people. This attitude appears to be complemented by a Metro roads and traffic project which recently tore up the Crescent for "maintenance purposes". The road was in fair condition prior to the 'overhaul' and the cost of reconstruction was between $400,000 and $500,000.

Another dodger is headed for the spot near where a U of T student was knocked down yesterday

The committee's rationale for deferring traffic lights on the Crescent is that "since the $9,000 needed for the traffic lights can't be fitted into this year's budget, the signals won't be installed until 1974."

Gyms will be a little cooler to save energy

By BOB WACHTEL

Lights are aplenty at late-night Sid Smith while things will be a little cooler for the jocks.

U of T has not reacted officially to the present energy crisis, according to Frank Hastie, chairman of the physical plant planning committee.

In a phone interview Wednesday, Hastie stated that at present, cutbacks are on a voluntary basis and confined to encouraging occupants of buildings to lower thermostats and turn off lights not in use.

Any official action, if necessary, would be taken by the Physical Plant "only in consultation with U of T president John Evans and provost Don Forster" he said.

Hastie explained all of the new buildings on campus, including those at Vic and Trinity, are heated either by steam or super-hot water. The steam and water is, in turn, heated by either natural gas or oil.

During the summer months, when demand for gas is low, the university uses only gas.

In the winter, when consumer demand for gas is up, oil is used almost exclusively for heating purposes. Gas companies, said Hastie, give winter preference to individual consumers who, unlike the university, do not have an alternate source of power.

The university is supplied with gas by Consumers Gas, and splits its oil contracts between BP (British Petroleum), Gulf, and Texaco.

In the case of real power shortages, Hastie continued, certain priorities would be observed.

Foremost among these would be heating in buildings such as Ramsey Wright, in which sensitive biological experiments are under way. Heating in residences would also have high priority, he said.

Some buildings, such as the gym—"You're going there to work out anyway" said Hastie—could feasibly be cooled a bit.

Hastie noted the university has adequate supplies of oil to last 2-3 days in the case of complete oil deprivation.

The university has only recently switched its fuel supply from powered coal to natural gas and oil in an effort to fight pollution "We'd prefer using gas all year round, for environmental reasons," Hastie added.

The university has in 'the past been fairly efficient in its use of power, he said.

Reader takes on Parks department

The island community should not be destroyed (reference-open meeting, city hall, November 14).

Parks Commissioner Thompson proposes development of the east end of the Island for the handicapped, the aged, the poor. He makes an appeal to the supposedly noble aim of minimizing the pain in the tortured lives of the under privileged, thereby showing that, he too, cares—playing the role of the idealist in the light of the 700 viciously selfish inhabitants of five per cent of the Island's surface area. He takes pride in being a 'grass and trees' man who proposes paved tennis courts and who makes 'no excuses for it'. So, first we destroy the community, under the guise that what this city needs is parks and grass and trees in 'the interests of the 2,000,000 citizens of Toronto city, and then we build another plastic wonderland to put fat city man back into his naturally tranquilizing synthetic environment. Another Ontario Place looms on the horizon, a product of diseased minds caught in the destructive products of their own creation, confused by the vortex of inherent lies and justifications for fat city man to 'recreate' himself and substantive appeals to images of smiling faces and flailing arms and plastic legs in a plastic fantasyland.

The Islanders have nothing to say to such a misconstruction and gross distortion of anything that is meaningful. How can you speak to fat city man, when fat city man caught in the overkill of senseless impressions and constant invalidation of reality cannot hear the snow fall on the ground, has never seen the water in a lake, or felt the frailty of his existence beneath the living sun? You can patiently try to open this door for him, or you can merely register your seemingly selfish claim that a greater reality is being invalidated and thence destroyed by some monstrous machination against which even your stones and sticks are relegated to the level of abstraction and merely provide an irritation for fat city man as you watch the destruction of reality.

If we genuinely wish to serve the crippled it will have to be authentically and what this means is dialectically interweaving these living organisms into the organic whole of the Islands and the therapeutic value of reality concretized in the Island community.

This, I claim, is obvious.

Student library worker gripes

The University of Toronto administration knows when it has its students cornered—particularly those who are forced into minimum wage campus jobs. Who would have thought that those innocent library club meetings in high school were preparing U of T with its minimum wage slaves? I have found, after two months of part-time work at Sig-mund Samuel Library, that students employed in campus services are generally in the same financial straits as myself. (OSAP regulations which suppose that a single student under 24 years of age is financially dependent on his or her parents, coupled with the low paying jobs most students must accept during the summer months—or unemployment—mean that a large number of students must find jobs to see them through the academic year.)

A letter has already been written to The Varsity describing conditions of work at the Roberts fortress. Although Sig Sam Library's advertising gimmick (The "Other" Library) suggests that things are much different here than Roberts, the conditions facing workers are much the same.

Sig Sam is incredibly understaffed. U of T adds insult to injury by staffing its facilities so inadequately that its employees really persevere for their pathetic wages. It is not uncommon for students to miss break since they are often alone in sections with no one to replace them. In general, one student is assigned to a subject area each evening. This includes sorting and shelving books, filing, answering inquiries and other bureaucratic duties. Since only one student must contend with a sudden deluge of inquiries, jobs are often left half-completed which creates a certain amount of animosity between some full-time and part-time employees. Contrary to popular belief, students do not have time to study while they work.

The U of T pays part-time library workers $1.85 an hour. Students with a year's experience receive $2.10. I would like to dispel the myth that most students who work part-time are supplementing larger incomes or allowances from Mum and Dad. (A student once asked me if I was working evenings because I was "bored with Academia". Hmmm.) After tuition payments book purchases, and living costs, the savings of many students have all but disappeared after a month of studying. Many of us are relying on our part-time earnings to pay our rent, food, transportation costs, etc.

It undoubtedly pleases Simcoe Hall that so few can do so much for so many for so little. U of T is not unlike any capitalist organization which wants to extract as much surplus value from its wage slaves as possible. For those of us who fit into the lower rungs of U of T's bureaucracy, the message from above is loud and clear. But we can ill-afford to eat cake.

Vietnam coverage is insufficient

Reduced press coverage in Vietnam is a major factor in the lack of news in our papers about the worsening problems for the civilian political prisoners in South Vietnam. The best reporters have either been removed by Thieu, for unsympathetic stories, or they've been sent to other theatres or war.

People like French-speaking Jacques Leslie of the Los Angeles Times, who used to avail himself of the good, 'unofficial' contacts in South Vietnam, and kept us abreast of the situation, have been replaced by old Pentagon hacks who can be depended upon for a consistent military line.

Allende articles inconsistent

Your articles on the visit of Mrs Allende to this university exhibit a number of logical inconsistencies. On the one hand you accuse the US of promoting the September coup (an unproven hypothesis at best), but on the other hand you urge Canada to intervene in the situation by boycotting Chilean exports. What makes the second instance of meddling any more justified than the first?

Moreover, Mrs. Allende's description of the situation comes from "numerous eyewitness accounts", but at the same time she rejects the eyewitness reports issued by the present government as false. I fail to see how Mrs. Allende can know which version is the correct one, especially as she herself is no longer in the country. But more seriously, I am distressed by the reporting in The Varsity which seems to present only one narrow extreme point of view to the detriment of any logical consistency.

Fromm replies to article

Tim Gallagher (Canadian Party of Labour?) writes "Heil Fromm!" in a letter to last Friday's Varsity. Heil, yourself, Tim! His incoherent letter and the Varsity's biased journalism has obscured two points about the Campus Alternative.

Firstly, unlike the various Marxist groups on campus, we don't claim to have figured out a solution to every one of the world's problems. We agreed initially to act as a forum where conservative students can gather and exchange views. Secondly, we are attempting to work out and articulate an alternative to the current political situation at the University of Toronto.

At present, a small handful of Marxists and leftists have a near stranglehold on such papers as the Varsity and such political institutions as SAC and the GSU. It is time that these institutions became more representative and began serving the interests of the majority of U of T students. It is symptomatic of the arrogance of the campus left that many of them now seek to deny the engineers their newspaper, simply because SDS doesn't like its policies. At its meeting, Campus Alternative deplored the fact that the editorializing in the Varsity doesn't stop with the editorial page. Many of the news stories are less news, than a running political commentary. Furthermore, the selection of off-campus news is extremely one-sided. Many of the stories might just as well be right out of the Canadian Communist Party's Tribune.

Hart House pool 'a filthy joke'

Attention: all males who need a legitimate excuse for missing Christmas examinations, or extensions on assignments, then read this message.

You can obtain a doctor's certificate, certifying that you have an excruciating ear infection, which has resulted in confinement to bed, and an expensive medication bill.

Here's all you have to do. Trot over to Hart House and go for a dip in the sewer (I mean pool). Within days you'll become incensed with pain in at least one ear. Don't worry too much, for a mere $7 worth of medication, the pain will be extinguished in approximately six days.

Yest, sports fans, the Hart House pool is a filthy joke. Please note-if you're not a good swimmer then please don't go. You may swallow some water and choke to death on the public hairs.

In conclusion, if you feel like repeating a good act of someone we all know and admire, then just go over to the Hart House pool and "Walk across the water" and all the other shit that's in the pool!

Objection to 'Hitlerite' label

After looking over this year's bumper crop of mindless radicals, we of The Campus Alternative expected that we would be labelled Hitlerites. We were not disappointed. Little Timmy Gallagher in his missive (Write on, November 23) did just that. It is indeed an incredible feat of mental gymnastics that Comrade Gallagher performed to attach this label to us. How he managed to arrive at the conclusion that an association whose constitution specifies a belief in the rights and responsibilities of the individual and opposition to socialism, is a Fan Club for a totalitarian socialist is quite beyond me.

Also, how he managed to turn the meeting's brief and superficial discussion of immigration into advocacy of racism is the sort of breath-taking ideological jump that leaves mere mortals (and logicians) far behind.

Tim, you were born too late; they could have used you at the Salem witch trials.

Police conduct angers picketer

With a group of other students and faculty from the University of Toronto, Faculty of Social Work, I joined the picket lines at the Artistic Woodworkers strike. I think that the issue of the workers wanting to negotiate through their union and end to the arbitrary firings without any structure for appeals is well known. What I wish to comment on is the role of the Metropolitan Toronto Police force in this strike.

It has been said, and I concur, that the police are serving and protecting the management in this dispute and are functioning effectively as strike breakers. However, tragic though this may be, my real grievance has to do with the conduct of the police in acting in the capacity of strike breakers. The morning of November 14, 1973 was my first experience on an actual picket line and I was shocked, horrified, depressed and angered by the behavior of the police. The police were large and powerful men who were clearly capable of pushing back the picket line in a "non-violent" manner. Rather, to my disgust they lashed out, usually unprovoked, at the strikers, punching them in the face, stomach and groin. These savage and brutal attacks were frequently followed up by kicks when people fell to the ground. Efforts were made by some to record these acts occurring in the middle of the melee and I witnessed cameras being deliberately smashed and destroyed by the policemen.

Perhaps, most depressing of all were the gleeful smiles on the faces of certain police officers as they gouged at persons' eyes and faces or choked or punched them. The most vicious officers removed their numbers and could not be identified. When I attempted to have a man on the roof arrested for throwing rocks at people the sergeant to whom I spoke (#1289) refused to listen, look or act. This constitutes an outrage; it is immoral and irresponsible behaviour.

Prior to this morning, I was opposed to the application of the word "pigs" and other terms of opprobrium and contempt to police officers. Now, I sadly find them un-derstandable.

I urge you gentlemen to use your power and influence to effect government intervention and to prevent serious escalation which may lead to ever greater tragedy.

SDS carrying burden of guilt?

It seems to me that most of the SDS, being WASPUS, are trying to carry the "WASPman's burden" of guilt on their shoulders. Their group complains of Toke Racism, yet the hundreds of students who came out Wednesday to defend the Toike, were composed to a large extent of many ethnic groups including the groups "insulted" in the last issue.

The female SDS members showed an uncalled for display of violence, unlike experienced Mr. Depoe and most of the other male members. I found it hard to tell if those women cared to much about racism or if they just had chips on their shoulders. I imagine those females felt sexually predisposed to strike out. They called an Italian student, who was being attacked, a male chauvinist pig when he refused to strike back. Then when he finally obliged his four attackers, they tried to charge him with assault, using their sex as an excuse for a publicity court case.

If these people initiate violence as their form of "less talk - more action", then they had better expect to receive as well as give and not back out of fights with cowardly cries of assault.

Reader details fuel alternatives

In view of the public's concern with the energy crisis, I feel comment is appropriate in the reporting of Dr. Porter's "worries". Not knowing Dr. Porter's exact statement, I address myself to the unbalanced reporting.

First, the headline "Nuclear Power Means Waste" almost implies that other commercial forms of electric power generation do not mean waste. This leaves a very incorrect impression. Thermal generating stations fuelled with coal, gas or fuel oil also use essentially the same method of steam-driven generators referred to in the article. The largest inefficiencies lie in these steam-driven generators. This thermal pollution (i.e., heat wastage due to these inefficiencies) is equally caused by the fossil-fuelled stations.

The trade-off we must consider is that of nuclear power stations versus fossil-fuelled power stations. Nuclear power stations produce cheaper electricity and do not pollute the environment with dangerous sulphur dioxide fumes (after our god, the automobile, the two thermal electric power stations providing Toronto contribute the most pollution to our air.) Of course, the trade-off is the possible risk due to radioactive materials. In Canada, we use a reactor system, CANDU, which is much less dangerous than that of other countries; consequently, the radiation effects are extremely low. And after this past month, what can I say about fuels? Only that our sources of uranium are all found within Canada (and we own them!).

Second, other alternatives available for commercial power generation must be considered. In the past, Ontario had depended on hydro-electric stations such as Niagara Falls. However, the river basin's capacity for effective use has been reached; unless we dare to proceed with a "rape of land" as Bourassa is envisaging in Quebec (see the full spread article on James Bay on the pages of the Varsity on November 5). This, in fact, is why Ontario Hydro came to rely on fossil-fuelled stations. Now nuclear power stations present a better alternative.

Other forms of electricity generation are referred to, especially fusion. Fusion apparently will be the source of much power but only after 2020 AD when it may be perfected. Geothermal and solar power systems also exist. Until the 21st century, however, none of these are commercially viable in the quantities our urban society demands.

A comment is needed concerning our "legitimate energy demands" through our use of the automobiles, air conditioner, frivolous appliances, etc., we have created such demands for energy and resources that the supply of these demands makes for an over-dependant society. Even our neighbours to the south (because they are many more than us) demand our energy and our resources. When shall we all reconsider what are necessary demands based on need and what are frivolous needs based on luxury?

And do not forget that thermodynamically speaking, "Every irreversible process leads to the dissipation of energy".

Why are there no Andorran jokes?

I would like to add these words to those of Mario Tino and David DePoe, who in Monday's Varsity, wrote to protest the use of Italian jokes by the editor of the Toke Oike in the rag of that name. I ask, who is this racist of an editor that he believes he has the right to assume that it is not impolite to make jokes about other people? It is indeed most impolite. I come from the small country of Andorra in the lovely Pyrenees and what I want to know is why there are no Andorran jokes. We are in no way inferior to Mr. Tino and we too deserve the opportunity and the right to act highly offended and raise a stink.

Moreover, the Toke Oike should realize that in laughing at others, but rather, as Mr. Tino demonstrated by his letter, in the risk of making oneself appear a little ridiculous.

Have you Jimmy Olsons and Lois Lanes run out of quotations from Norman Bethune, John Evans, and William Frawley? I'm referring to the childish equivalent of "your morning smile" which appeared opposite your editorial page masthead of November 7. Crows Nest disappointing

As a first year student interested in sociology, seeking a refuge from the forced labor camp of mathematical abstraction, I visited the Crow's Nest in the Borden Building last Thursday.

I did not expect, and did not receive, revelation as to the nature of sociology, nor was the veil removed from my eyes in regards to the subtle (to me) demarcation between psychology and sociology.

While not anticipating much in this way, I was still disappointed. The explanations given me vacillated between vague mumbblings and rigid doctrinal descriptions which left me more in the dark than before.

Perceiving the problem to be the natural gap present between teaching assistants and undergraduates, I think my failure lay in the fact that few other students attended. Perhaps others intuitively understand the nuances of this subject matter, and thus see no reason in attendance. Congratulations are due to you; but with apologies to Nasrudin, I am still looking for the key under the street lamp, it being lost in the house: and can only continue to search in this way until some brighter light emerges.

I do hope that others will take advantage of the opportunity offered by the sociology department to attend the Crow's Nest discussions. They could be worthwhile.

Varsity ignores 'gut' issues

It is our opinion that the degenerate leftist attitude, somewhat supported by the editorial staff of The Varsity, does not reflect the views of the engineering community nor the attitude of the university as a whole.

Why does The Varsity continually support the very small minority of leftist pinko radicals ignoring the "gut" issues of Canadian politics? Could it be that the continuing Varsity articles concerning such topics as Chilean Leftists, United Farmworkers, Artist Woodworkers, Dare Cookies and Toke racism (which doesn't exist) are reflections of the true beliefs of the pseudo-Communist staff of The Varsity? We don't know but we are waiting for a clear statement on Varsity editorial intent.

We find it strange and incomprehensible that in a just and democratic society that such anachronistic and vocal minorities such as the RMG, Communist Club, SDS, etc. are given so much print in a paper devoted to the serious affairs of the university. We also find it hard to believe how supposedly serious, industrious students could devote so much of their time to such insidious pastimes. Where do these people come from?

It's time that The Varsity cut the crap and approached the relevant current events with a more unbiased student viewpoint!

Island decision follows 20 years of wrangling

By DICK BROWN

The showdown over who gets the residential portion of the Toronto Islands began yesterday as the Metro parks committee passed a recommendation that island residents be evicted.

That recommendation goes on to the Metro executive Tuesday with a final decision by the full Metro Council December 11, and no one is making odds on which way that final vote will go.

Meanwhile, back at city hall, Toronto city council has offered to take over the residential section of Ward's and Algonquin Islands to preserve the housing. Metro wants to turn the 35-acre residential side into more parkland, including "Toytown", "Sportsland" and "Funland."

The debate has raged at various levels of intensity since the 1940s, and the next three weeks will make the final decision.

If Metro wins, the Ward's Islands homes will be ripped down for a Coney-Island style amusement park, and the Algonquin Island homes will be torn down to be divided up between a par-3 golf course and the Queens City Yacht Club.

Currently, the club has a small corner of Algonquin Island, but the Metro proposal would turn over about a quarter of the island to the yacht club.

The city proposal would preserve the 254 houses and the current population of about 700, although some estimates place the population figure in the mid-600s.

About 100 years ago the islands started to become a residential area when Hanlan's Point, at the west end of the islands became the site of the first summer cottages.

Along with the cottages was built an amusement area and baseball stadium on what is now the Island airport.

By the late 1870s, the grand old Victorian palaces of the Torontonians rich were being built on Centre Island replete with fire station, hotels and shops.

Ward's Island residences, built shortly afterwards were divided sharply along class lines with the sometimes grand summer cottages along the western lakeshore and a contrasting tent city sprang up at the turn of the century where now residents are fighting to preserve their homes.

At the turn of the century, about 3,000 persons lived on the islands, mainly on Hanlan's and Centre. Island life was quiet then, a world and community unto itself quite undisturbed by the comings and goings in the mainland city.

But by the 1930s, the city began to turn its comings and goings on to the islands and their secluded summer resort life-style.

The island airport was built in the Thirties, and many Hanlan's Point houses were destroyed. Others were floated over to what is now called Algonquin Island—known then as Sunfish Islands—and some are still standing on perimeter lots.

The tent city on Ward's Island was being converted into wooden structures during this time, and many still remain.

By the late 1930s, a legal arrangement between island residents and the city of Toronto provided the groundwork for the legal problems facing islanders today.

While islanders owned their own cottage or home, they rented the land from municipal government. In 1938 leases were drawn up.

Algonquin residents had a 21 year lease with a maximum 10 year extension clause on their parcels of land and Ward's Islanders had renewable yearly leases.

Included in the leases, were clauses saying the cottage owners would receive no compensation if their leases were terminated and they were evicted, and owners could not sublet without permission.

Those two clauses have come back to haunt islanders 35 years for if Metro wins the December 11 vote, islanders will not get a cent for their homes, and islanders have been unable to sublet their homes legally as Metro has at times refused to give permission in an effort to vacate the homes via natural attrition.

As a result of the post-World War II housing shortage, city officials encouraged winterizing the cottages, and year-round residency increased dramatically so that by 1948 about 8,000 summer residents lived on the islands and by 1951 there were about 2,000 winter residents.

While ideas for the islands are by no means new—a 1911 proposal suggested extending Bathurst Street to the islands on the west to connect with Cherry Street on the east—it was 1947 before island-developing became a favorite Torontonians pastime.

In the 26 years since then, every proposal since has started with a basic promise: get rid of the island residents homes, then do something else with the islands.

The 1947 proposal which started it all off was a Toronto city planning board draft report recommending ripping down the cottages, put up apartment building, construct a highway to the island and provide parking for about 5,000 cars.

The draft report never got final approval, but the thought spurred on other ideas. Another proposal suggested high-rises, luxury apartment and hotels.

By 1952, the city had changed its earlier proposal and suggested that in connection with the Toronto Harbor Commission the city should turn the islands into parkland reserving 136 acres of the 1,000 acre area for residential usage.

The residential usage proposed was apartments and hotels complete with a bridge to the island over the western gap and parking for 9,000 cars.

Many of the proposals of the 1950s found their economic base in the high cost of the ferry service, which until 1962 was run by the Toronto Transit Commission. Metro assumed the ferry service in 1962, and the howls virtually stopped.

By the early 1950s, island residents had offered their counter-proposal, which 20 years later sounds much the same: things are just fine as they are; leave us and our homes alone.

However, flooding of the islands in the spring of 1954 led to the city turning over the islands to Metro by early 1956.

While the 1954 water levels were very close to this past spring's water levels, the flooding effects were more serious because of the lower land levels of the islands 19 years ago.

Another factor influencing the transfer to Metro was the growing feeling that "pure parkland" unadorned by residences would be a good thing for the growing city to have.

Metro wasted no time in starting the parkland, and put the bulldozer to Hanlan's Point and Centre Island homes in 1957.

In the early 1960s, Metro finally got around to putting out a master plan for the development of the parkland.

Since 1968, Ward's and Algonquin Islanders have been living on yearly lease renewals, which traditionally would come up at the end of August each year. Marathon lobbying at Metro Council by islanders would stall off eviction for another year.

This year, however, the yearly wrangling at Metro took a new twist. Metro did not decide to renew for another year, but instead the final decision on the fate of a 100-year-old residential tradition will come to a head just before Christmas.

The groundwork for next month's vote, laid over 20 years ago, is finally coming to a showdown, and islanders are already waging the fight.

This weekend, for instance, two island homes are open during the day for visitors to come in and chat. Saturday, the Atkinson residence at 4 Second Street on Ward's Island, and Sunday the Widman residence at 28 Omaha on Algonquin Island are to be open.

So the question this year is, what sort of Christmas present will Santa's elves at Metro Council give to the islanders?

Metro's proposal would give Queens City YC part of resident's homes.

Residential area of Algonquin and Ward's Islands look like this today.

Walker nice, Scruggs not so nice in new grass foursome

Country music subdivides the same way classical or pop does, the main streams being "old time", bluegrass and country and western. "Old time" music is the motherlode, as blues is to rock. Like traditional folk, you hardly ever hear it on radio, perhaps because it is too gritty or, less charitably, because it is too distinctive. Regional styles can still be clearly picked out of old time music, and it is perhaps the only North American style where you can listen to a tune and tell whether the version is from Quebec, Cape Breton or Appalachia. Old time songs are usually about work, the way songs now are about love. Or they are about murder. Woody Guthrie is an archetypal old time musician. That he is not recognized as such (he isn't in the Country Music Hall of Fame), is the result of politics not music.

Bluegrass is what happened to old time when full-time, town musicians took it over. The hill-billy kid in Deliverance should have played dirty, funky old time banjo, but the sound track — rang pure Nashville bluegrass — fast, brilliant, expensive and loud. Banjo predominates in bluegrass along with mandolin and any other instrument that can keep up. The speed is blurring and the test for a superior bluegrass picker is, can he play slow. Few can. There is not much time for feeling in bluegrass.

Feeling however, is there by the bucket full in country and western. C and W is the real hurlin' music, heavy on steel guitar and the heart-strings, with no room for the punctuating sound of banjos. (Banjo, as a member of Second Generation put it, is for bluegrass or commercials.) Country and Western subject matter is familial or chauvinist, and, while there is a homey consciousness in some of the old time tunes, country and western stays pretty, er, straight-forward. "D-I-V-O-R-C-E" is classical C and W.

The New Lost City Ramblers are the only easily accessible old time band. Bluegrass is easy enough to find: for pure bluegrass you could check any Flatt and Scruggs record. For the more souped-up variety try The Dillards. You have to look harder, for good country and western, as you would for good AM rock. Try Jimmy Rogers, The Singing Brakeman. Bits of all styles are on the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band's three record compendium of Nashville's finest musicians, Will The Circle Be Unbroken. It has been selling steadily since its release last spring.

Most of us however tend to stick with "long-haired country" or "new grass" or whatever is the best name for the folk, rock influenced country of Prine, Kristofferson, Hartford, Arlo Guthrie, Loggins and Messina, the Band, New Riders of the Purple Sage and so on. Musically it is subtler and the words are less often embarrassing.

Jerry Jeff Walker's new MCA album Viva Terlingua is a nice country-city hybrid and also a nice step for him, since it is the first record to catch a bit of his charisma. Walker is more influential than famous, and he has the loyal, even reverential following of a much bigger star. You can hear it in the live cuts on the album, although, if you are removed enough, the audience enthusiasm may sound exaggerated. If you've spent any time with Walker, it seems just and due.

Old Walker fans should be warned that this is the new, electric Jerry Jeff that played Mackenzie's a few weeks back with essentially the same band. I sadden a bit whenever a folk-singer goes over, but, in this case, it came at a good time. Harsh as it sounds, Walker as a writer of quiet-but-tough-minded songs has dried up. Though he still writes, the epiphanies come few and far between, replaced by litanous homilies like "gettin' by's my stock 'n trade, livin' it day to day" or "livin' my life easy come easy go". Etc. His last album, Jerry Jeff Walker (also on MCA) was salted with choruses so simple that they didn't bear repetition. The excuse for repeating a cliché is that the music underneath really cooks. There it didn't, at least not as reproduced on the record, but on Viva Terlingua it does. While Walker's new songs aren't vintage, he still displays a good eye for other people's tunes, here ones by Guy Clark, Mike Murphy and Gary Nunn. Walker pours a lot into Clark's "Desperadoes Waiting For A Train", and, if it becomes a hit, it will be as good for the radio as for him. CFGM is not used to playing its like.

Another, and less likely new country singer is Ian Matthews, once of England's perennial folk-rock band, Fairport Convention. Actually there's been a fondness for American country in England for quite a while, particularly in the North: country and western has always been big in Liverpool. Matthews' album Valley Hi is pleasant enough, at least I've played one side of it quite a bit. His unschooled British baritone takes some of the maudlin quality out of "If You've Handed Me One, You've Handed Me A Thousand Shady Lies". There is a good and certainly eclectic selection of tunes, from the traditional, modal "Same Old Man Workin' at the Mill" (which I've also heard was written by the Dillards' father) to Don Gibson's "It's Been a Blue Blue Day", plus tunes by Jackson Browne and Randy Newman. Still, they all get betrayed for me by the heavy reverb and steel guitar of the C and W idiom. Perhaps in America that gives the genre an ambience. Here it makes the most individual songs sound the same.

Two other "new grass" records that have come my way I don't like at all, one being Free Rural Delivery by Eric Weissberg and Deliverance and the other being The Earl Scruggs Revue.

The Scruggs record is a disappointment after the Revue's earlier live album with fiddle-player Vassar Clements. The old record was bluegrass — and who better than Scruggs for that — mixing nicely with some rock provided by the younger Scruggs, three of whom play in the Revue with their father. But in the studio, and without Clements, the stuff seems pretty ordinary and singularly un-blue. In fact, Earl Scruggs is rather vestigial among the country rock. The banjo is rarely featured and, more often than not, sounds out of place behind heavy blues-rock solos. It's good of Scruggs to give his boys a say like this, and what they have, perhaps democratically, chosen to lay down is well enough executed, though of not much interest to me. Perhaps this is a new direction for Scruggs himself who was also the first country star to oppose the Vietnam war. Perhaps his background work in his own Revue is humility. After all, most people thought Don Messer was Charley Chamberlain.

The question Eric Weissberg faced was of course, what do you do after Deliverance. The answer Free Rural Delivery is more of the same. It's a perfectly good answer if you like slick bluegrass picking, but for me it is like juggling acts: one is enough. As well as the fast-picking there are some new country and western tunes by members of Weissberg's band (Deliverance) including the immediately immortal "Thanks for Bein' You and Lovin' Me". Were these big-time New York studio musicians being serious? They are slick and used to playing what's put in front of them so it is hard to tell; there's no self-conscious horsing around to give it away. Weissberg is a New York Jew who graduated from the Juilliard School of Music and has made $70,000 a year scoring TV commercials. I wonder what he thinks of the album. It is always possible that he and Steve Mandell and the others, with their backgrounds in folk, are aficionados of the diamond in the rough of the American country-shlock vernacular. My guess, though, is that this was a weekend's work in the studio, wedged in between the Schlitz and Metropolitan Life accounts.

Cop, a musical documentary based on the Metro police force, premiered at the Saint Stephen-in-the-Fields Church, 103 Bellevue Avenue, last Wednesday night. A full house crowd encountered an entertaining yet perplexing and ambiguous review of all the TV police material that you have spent the last five years changing channels to avoid.

Produced by the Open Circle Theatre, the play exposes material uncovered in a recent study of the Metro police. Yet, a viewer has to wonder how deep the study went or how well documented the entire production was.

An indication of the production's intent greets the audience in the program. The inside front cover quotes Jack Webb's antique TV serial epitaph: "The play you are about to see is true. Only the names have been changed to protect the innocent and... the guilty." Recalling from this cute cop colloquialism, you don't know whether to take it seriously or just acknowledge an attempt at satire.

Unfortunately, the remark with its acute banality foreshadows the production. The attempts at satire and humor seldom do more than reiterate such blatant triviality. Evidence of creativity and imagination is conspicuously absent.

As a musical documentary, the production proceeds through a series of satiric, musical escapades and occasional vignettes of a more serious nature in the day-in-the-life-of the Toronto police. The initial episode presents a tug-of-war between Metro cops and Detroit officers. Working in the martial spirit of 'pull together,' Toronto tugs through leaving the image of City Hall, the CN Tower and the Metro Police untarnished.

Continuing the episodic style, the scenes shift (with little apparent continuity and direction) to a public relations interview with the officer on the beat (accentuating his robotic reflexes); a visit to Metro's version of Madame Tussaud's wax museum replete with all Metro's unsolved crimes; a salary discussion with a farmer at the Royal Winter Fair who agrees that Toronto does indeed have a "good police force;" confiscation of a thrice-viewed blue movie; a hymn to "Beaucracy" and to conclude the first act, a parody on the Artistic strike.

The peak of audience reaction occurs when the cast works in pantomime. A Keystone cops sequence, animated in the brisk, Chaplinesque motion, copped most of the applause.

But the script suffers from a combination of trite material and insipid method. The humor blunders into banality (simple grade school jokes of Cain and Abel, lines such as "as funny as a sow pissing in the moonlight"), with certain exceptions such as the promiscuous officer who remarks that "he is letting down what he is sworn to uphold."

In consequence, the supposedly serious soliloquies are superficial and incredulous à la Jack Webb or Broderick Crawford. One officer, while polishing his stirrups and grooming his horse, explains his life and his marriage to the police force, attempting to rescue a depth of character that the script has denied him. A street social worker describes police brutality including the appropriate number of shits and fucks to appear avant garde. Wit and ingenuity are sparsely exercised in the script and it descends into the tomb of triviality.

The musical score encounters similar problems. With some exceptions, notably "Busted" and the finale, the music composed by Pierre Gallant and Sylvia Tucker, continues the same gibberish that inhabits the script. Also the piano player distracts from the entire production by constantly sidling on and off stage.

A six member cast performs well despite the script. Michael Marshall (who aided in the musical score) and Desmond Ellis manage to make their portrayal of Toronto's version of Car 54's Toody and Muldoon, enjoyable. The female characters, in their policewoman roles, fail to attain either plausibility or humor, although that may be an accurate representation of the woman-as-eunuch motif that seems to characterize women in police work.

When they drop the dialogue, such as in the Madame Tussard scene and the Keystone parody, the players perform well, infusing some vigor into the production. However, these scenes are too few.

The subject matter of the documentary confronts problems for any theatre company. What is an accurate portrait of the police department? Can results from a survey of the police department be dramatized? In Cop, the picture is never focused. The attempts at satire are predominantly trivial, the humor insipid and consequently the serious scenes never attain the plausibility or solemnity that defines dramatic realism or credulity.

The same aspects of police work that Adam 12, Emergency and Police Surgeon serve to the pate of the TV audience are reshaped and reiterated with a Toronto tinge. The suggested dilemma of "serving and protecting" is never clarified nor a resolution proposed. In Cop, only the city, the officers' names and the name of the police force have been changed.

Dance of Death, Carnival are deadly theatre

This has been a strange week for theatre in Toronto.

Several new openings have corresponded with the initiation of new directors, new adaptations of old plays, new proliferations of theatrical activity and a lot of enervated stagecraft. We now have prodigious numbers of Thespian devotees, equalled by followers of the comic muse, play areas in every nook and cranny of the city's various basements, warehouses, churches and cultural temples, multitudinous amounts of dramatic effort and a reciprocal dearth of living theatre. The closest thing to date is probably the Tarragon Theatre's Sticks and Stones: The Donnelly's Part One, which although carried away with its own style at times and suffering from an overlong and repetitious first act, does embrace vitality and imagination as basic to its production. But more on that next week.

I approached Strindberg's The Dance of Death at the St. Lawrence Centre with some trepidation, conditioned to expect the usual stagey, overly-mannered and superficially smooth production which somehow relies on a sophisticated scenario to carry the drama. On the other hand, I expected a certain flair and some imaginative stage movement from the Toronto Workshop Production of Anouilh's Thieves' Carnival. Well Strindberg at least came through with the written script of Dance of Death but the general performance level of the two plays is close to Peter Brook's definition of deadly theatre — one which not only fails to elevate or instruct, but doesn't even entertain.

Strindberg, to some extent, certainly does instruct or at least expose. The play, about a married couple 25 years later, is a fascinating study of a violent relationship held together not by mutual love but by a love of mutual hatred. The strength of the marriage lies in the resources of each of the partners to attack or counterattack in a compelling pattern of thrusts and parries. The rhythm of this vindictive ritual is counterpointed with the appearance of a broken marriage, who attempts to mediate between aggressive passions far beyond his understanding. He witnesses and runs from the Captain's broken dance of death which serves as a leitmotif to the play's dramatic structure. In the end the warring couple is left in a buffer zone of uneasy and temporary truce. But what of this production!

Denise Pelletier, as Alice the wife, gives a technically interesting performance, controlled, measured and stylish, but only rides the crest of the emotional intensity of the role, leaving Anthony Palmer's Edgar wallowing in the backwash. Palmer's interpretation of the dying Captain is soft-centered, rarely sparking with the opposing current of his partner. Once again it is the set which comes to the fore, offering dynamic interpretation where performance lacked.

Using a half-circle stage surrounded by a moat, with huge palisades looming behind and splitting the space above the acting area, Mark Neglin's set creates an island fortress which is both a physical reality and a metaphor for the impenetrable cage of this marriage. The naturalistic detail of the dark, heavy, interior decor adds to the confinement of both place and soul.

Thieves' Carnival, as adapted for this TWP performance, cannot even boast the attractions of a fascinating script. The play, a supposedly light and comic fantasy, bogs down in a bleak and dreary set which is as bony and meatless as the acting. The characters of this story, thieves with aristocratic names and pretensions, play a game of masquerades designed to turn the harshness of life into romantic illusion. But just as the Carnival of Thieves which they dress up for turns out to be a Carnival of Leaves, so the Thieves' Carnival which we turn out for seems to be a case of mistaken identity. There is no lightness, no real zest in this production, no shared fun in the exchange of masks and only occasional glimpses of the creative choreography usually associated with TWP.

Peter Brook also has something to say about the deadly critic. And although we too are an ever expanding species (with quantity again superseding quality) Brook points out that, "if he spends most of his time grumbling, he is almost always right."

The Variety 9

"Aesthetics, if properly understood will always increase sales" (We understand)

Diamond Jim Brady and Lily Langtry looked far and wide for a gold chamber-pot before they discovered Tiffany's.

The Tiffany Touch Joseph Purtell Pocket Books

There is a hatter on Spadina Avenue. "Sammy Taft's, World Famous Hatter," the huge sign above the tiny store front proclaims. Along the walls of the display windows are pictures of the great and famous receiving hats from Sammy. Jack Benny, Jimmy Durante, Bob Hope, Frank Sinatra, ...to tell the truth I can't recognize any of the others (though there are many more). One picture, one picture only, has a label: "Willie Mays".

"Hell, fellas, this isn't just any Negro, this is a famous Negro."

But a hat is a hat and grandiose pretensions are grandiose pretensions.

And there is Cavouk's photography studio in the Colonnade, surely one of the strangest stores in Toronto. Imagine a sheik's tent lined with carpets and velvets, lit with photography floodlights and hung with the greatest variety of huge and incredibly gaudy living colour portraits. That's Cavouk's.

The window is crowded with testimonials from such current eminents as Harold Macmillan and Hubert Humphrey and Jean Lesage and there are photos there of Cavouk meeting the Pope (Paul) and Cavouk meeting that other happy photographer Antony Armstrong-Jones. There's even the 1965 Christmas card of the Queen Mother—for which a portrait by Cavouk was used (a portrait in which she is admittedly looking her inimitably dotty best).

But after all the man simply happens to take photographs.

And then there's Tiffany's.

Tiffany's is a department store.

In New York.

Tiffany's is a "name synonymous with glamour and expensive good taste."

It's the status-symbol department store that Americans revealingly insist on sentimentalizing.

It only sells jewellery and china and stationery and expensive odds and ends.

Nevertheless it's a temptation to treat the efforts the store goes to in its humble devotion to the rich as part of an incredible surrealist vision. The store presents fashion shows — well attended — of china settings. It makes its own stationery. One glue is used for adhesiveness on the three presealed flaps and another is used for taste (for us, for the rich among us) on the fourth. Marcel Duchamp, where are you when we need you?

In the distance (in the vision) I see a craftsman working with concentration and humble pride on the gift Diamond Jim Brady wanted for presentation to Lily Langtry. "He asked Tiffany's to make (and they made it) a solid-gold chamber pot; in the centre of the bottom, peering up, was an eye."

Author Purtell's description of the store's present top jewellery designer Jean Schulmberger — "rhymes with Fabergé," as Purtell disarmingly notes — fits in.

"His house is primarily a workshop and his day begins at 7 am and continues until one in the afternoon. At his board he wears a midnight blue smock designed for him by Balenciaga. The master of sophistication keeps his radio on all the time, tuned into soap opera."

A little drama is enacted as part of the vision. The present Prince Napoleon, pretender to the imperial Crown of France "to be distinguished from the Comte de tood,

Paris, the Bourbon Orleans royal claimant) comes in to give Schulmberger "his most historic special order". He asks the Master of Sophistication to design a ring for his fiancée. "Prince Napoleon, who is descended from Napoleon's youngest brother, Jerome, is to supply the diamond, which has belonged to his great great aunt Josephine."

The design? "What can be more fitting than to surround the centre diamond with some marquise diamonds in the form of tiny bees, the emblem of the Empire?"

Prince Napoleon was pleased.

But what about this book itself?

The Tiffany Touch is one of those anecdotal social histories that "lovingly chronicling it all" makes a million mountains out of a million molehills (but when you've got that many it's hard to tell the difference).

This is one of those books in which the author's idea of refinement seems to extend only a bit, just a little bit, beyond name-dropping and alliterative titles.

This is one of those illustrated paperbacks ("lavishly illustrated") in which only the front cover illustration is in colour and is distinctly printed.

This is the kind of book that's reviewed by Women's Wear Daily (and indeed there's a quotation from a WWD review on the back cover). But nobody, dear reader, nobody goes to WWD for book reviews.

The book falls between two stools. The author knows the Tiffany gift catalogue by heart. But he has also read Nancy Mitford and he has pretensions of imitation.

Guess what.

The catalogue is more honest, anyway.

It was Charles Tiffany who first discovered for his family that great American tradition of becoming rich by pandering to the rich.

Charles died in 1901 leaving an estate of $35 million. Everything is relative. Cecil Rhodes who died the same year left $20 million.

Charles is a rather comic character — a stern paterfamilias who never missed a day of work in his life, a man "who looked you in the eye," who always held his back ramrod straight (he was rather short), punctual, long-lived and vigorous to the end — a veritable pillar of society — yet one whose social and financial success was totally dependant on something that really cannot have meant all that much to other people and that must have meant nothing at all to most of the American people.

An image of sophistication comes in the train of success. But Charles Tiffany claimed he had it, even as he teamed up with P.T. Barnum — "whose museum of freaks and genuine marvels was only six blocks away" — to their mutual benefit.

Louis Comfort Tiffany, Charles' son and the creator of Tiffany lamps and Favrite glassware, is a complete contrast to his father.

Charles pampered the new rich and provided them with their standards — the more ornamented it is, the heavier it is, the "better" it is. LCT (as Purcell refers to him) was doomed to try to satisfy his own acutely developed sense of beauty.

There is a story here but Purcell does not tell it.

There are two kinds of aesthetic geniuses — those who aim to express life at its fullest and most varied; and those who reject life for the purity of art. Delacroix and Degas; Shakespeare and Lyly; Ruskin and Pater.

Unhappy he who feels within himself the potentialities of both kinds of genius — as LCT did.

LCT began as a painter.

He moved out of the Tiffany mansion to live with several other young artists at the YMCA.

Bohemian Life!

He painted pictures so unacademic, so realistic, that he can be described as a forerunner of the Ash-Can school.

Yet the vases and lamps for which he is best known demand to be approached with the minimum of emotional response purely as beautiful objects.

LCT resolved the dilemma (perhaps) by becoming an interior decorator.

He "did" Mark Twain's house, "the yacht of James Gordon Bennett" and certain state rooms of the White House (destroyed by Teddy Roosevelt when he became President).

But surely there's something all right about an interior decorator who decorates a home in imitation of the chapels of Ravenna — as LCT did.

His own home, he said, was inspired by the Grand Canyon.

This house "contained a genuine Babylonian hanging garden with rare and exotic imported plants," stables, a bowling alley, "a separate art gallery (with a front wall from an Indian temple) to house his own paintings," and a separate chapel — the altar of which had been designed for the Cathedral of St. John the Divine in New York. (The cathedral's style was changed from Romanesque to Gothic. The altar did not conform. LCT installed it at home.)

The lamps, the vases, the stained glass windows are indeed very beautiful. (The lamps incidentally are very valuable now. Two — about three feet high, stand and shade both of glass — were going for $3,- 000 and $4,000 at the recent Wimodausis Antique show at the O'Keefe — even more expensive than the French-Canadian armchairs!) But Tiffany knew too much and he didn't know enough. His art is the product of decadent eclecticism. He never had to choose anything to be beautiful over anything else. All was beautiful, all was meaningful. LCT's awareness of the beauty of the art periods of the past — the Byzantine, the Elizabethan, the Grecian, — deprived him of his own vision. He heralds the breakup of art by his acceptance of everything and his rejection of nothing.

Purcell quotes a description of his house by a woman who was "as a little girl taken by her mother to see it," (Purcell, characteristically, does not identify the woman any more than this):

"It was frightening, everything gloomy and overhung, all those hangings and bright ugly tiles. It was terrifying, like something out of a bad dream."

When young Tiffany looked like the younger Hemingway. When old he was a parody of a Southern gentleman, goateed, white-haired, well tanned, always dressed in white, a product of the complete satisfaction of all his creature comforts.

LCT gave parties.

One was restricted to "Men of Genius."

"Grandchildren and their friends, dressed in long white robes, served the geniuses with among other things, peacocks skinned, roasted, and returned to the glory of their original feathers. (This is Purcell's style, not mine.)

"Among the guests were Childre Hassan, Frederick Bok, Nicola Tesla, William Sloane Coffin, and Charles Scribner," immortal men of genius every one.

Everything tends to parody in American culture.

It's rather sad though when a man of genius is content to assume he is a genius and so ends up just another eccentric.

The Tiffany family no longer controls the store. In the 1950s due to a slump in profits and an imprisoning image and through a series of skilful financial manoeuvres Walter Hoving took over the store.

Hoving is "a superb merchandiser," Purcell assures us.

One of his favourite remarks, Purcell says, is "aesthetics. If properly understood, will almost always increase sales."

Hoving is made particularly angry by reference to Tiffany's without permission to add glamour to a product.

"Such a reference provoked this reaction to an ad of the Kimberley-Clark Corporation which headlined its "Tiffany Taste."

Hoving wrote to the president of the company:

"I am rather surprised that you would use our name in this advertisement without permission. Especially so since we wouldn't be seen dead with a jewel box that even had the slightest resemblance to the one pictured. Nor do I think that the merchandise used in the background does credit to your great company. I think that, too, is just god awful."

Hoving, Purcell explains, "is so sincere in preaching his gospel of good taste that he might be said to be a fanatic on the subject."

Besides being a fanatic, Hoving is also the author of a best seller, "Tiffany Table Manners for Teenagers," inspired by his own experience in teaching manners to his children.

"If a boy spills water on a girl," the book warns, "don't start mopping her. It might be misunderstood."

Book sellers, Purcell notes, "believe that the little volume is as much read by adults as by children."

Remember when you got a piece of land and built yourself a house? Well, those monopoly capitalists have the whole thing sewn up now

Highrise and Superprofits
by Graham Barker, Jennifer Penney and Wally Secombe
Dumont Press/New Hogtown Press, $2.95

Most of the recent slew of books on urban politics have been muckraking sagas of connivance between developers and City Hall, or readable histories of one community's struggle against the forces of evil. Strong stuff, sure to make the readers spit with anger and shake their fists in the air.

Unfortunately, all too often people have been spitting into the wind and shaking their fist at the sky. The enemy is more than the speculator next door or the blockbuster down the street, or even the development commissioner at City Hall. So Highrise and Superprofits, an analysis of the land development industry in Canada within a general marxist analysis of capitalism, should be welcomed as a good thing.

Some people may be a little disappointed that the book is not more practical (I was).

Highrise originates in the Developer's Series published in Guerilla in the winter of 1971-72. In their foreword, the authors explain that in the process of preparing the articles, most of the people initially involved dropped out, "including those more concretely involved in anti-developer struggles". A few days ago, one of the drop-outs explained to me why she did so: "I wanted to write something concrete on local struggles in Toronto to aid the organizing of those struggles, but most everyone else wanted to write the perfect marxist analysis of housing and development in Canada."

Rather than focusing on current development activity at the neighborhood level or at City Hall, they take a broader approach. They have a sense of history, a national (and multinational) perspective, and a clear awareness that current land development and housing practices are tied into a larger society and a specific social structure. Almost uniquely among writers on urban affairs, they understand the importance of theory.

The central theme of the book is that the "real estate development industry is currently in a transitional period from the textbook free enterprise market of many small entrepreneurs competing with one another, to the final maturity of monopoly capitalism with a few huge firms working together and controlling the market."

In other words, land development is becoming more and more Big Business. The book's charts show that the formidable Cadillac Development Corporation (one of the two firms in Toronto made prominent by their large highrise apartment holdings) is overshadowed in assets and revenues by the relatively anonymous Trizec. A company like Markborough, which merely developed the town of Bramalea, is completely dwarfed. A local villain like Windlass, (were its assets known), would not even make the same chart as the giants.

Much attention has been spent in recent years on the blight of highrise apartment development in residential or mixed-use neighborhoods; but the provision of housing of all kinds is only a small part of the development business and Big Business is now getting into development. This is becoming increasingly evident in Toronto, where we have Yonge Street coming down from the Eaton Centre, and a sore thumb going up for the CN-CP Metro Centre.

Despite the housing shortage in Toronto (reflected in the continuous rise in rents, the low vacancy rates, and curses of my accommodation-hunting friends), and despite the high vacancy rate for office space, construction of new office towers continues in Toronto. Why? Because, there is more money to be made that way, even if one office in five stands empty. With eye-opening simplicity, the authors explain points like these and the financial factors underlying them.

The great strength of this book is its emphasis on the financial side of land development, including the financial impact of the government policies. Land developers are not accustomed to investing much of their own capital in any given project, and so are very sensitive to any change in the capital market. If a mortgage lender will cover only 70 per cent rather than 80 per cent of a project, the result is a 50 per cent increase in the amount of equity the developer must put up.

The federal government got into the business of financing the development industry through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The authors trace how the CMHC progressed from financing single-family housing for the modestly well-off worker to "underwriting the risks of capital" by guaranteeing profits for developments aimed at those people too "rich" for public housing, but too poor to find housing on the open market. Developers took advantage of CMHC's slackness to make windfall profits by building projects using only the CMHC mortgage money and not putting up any of their own, by building on otherwise unusable land, and by raising rents even before the buildings went up.

Their emphasis on high finance, however, causes them to lose sight of other factors. These days, surely, land developers and speculators are at least partly the passive beneficiaries of rising prices in the land market. It's hard to lose money on land as long as the long-term trend is toward capital concentration.

Development used to be a competitive industry. Now it's run by a few biggies.

Most of the book's deficiencies can be blamed on the millenarianism of Leon Trotsky's heirs. What's more, Trotsky never lived in a high-rise.

Some years ago, for example, SAC bought a piece of land for a highrise student residence, spent a lot of money and time on drawing up plans, found that it couldn't please the community as it had promised, and still made a tidy profit when it sold the land to the City as the site of the Kensington Community School. Land prices take a beating every now and then in Westmount, but that is something of an exception.

Because the authors look only at big-time developers, there is no premonition of the construction union scandals being played out every morning on the front page of the Globe. Is the M---a vertically and horizontally integrating the construction industry in Ontario? If so, that too provides support for the writers' main thesis.

Some of the book's defects are the result of the authors' distance from the field of battle. Not only were they not involved in "concrete local struggles", but they also do not seem to have benefited from the inside-dope available from the Brownstone-Dennis-Fish school of high-priced, progressive civil servant-academics.

Perhaps the main problem is that the writers are Trotskyists—two are members of the Revolutionary Marxist Group, and the third doth protest too much. This particular brand of Trotskyism was once described to me as believing that one could only wait for the February and October Revolutions, and in the meantime prepare oneself for street-corner speech-making through study. I never really believed it until Barker, Penney and Seacombe cited Engels as saying little can be done about housing until society is sufficiently transformed to begin abolishing the difference between town and country.

As a result of their Trotskyist detachment, the writers's theory has little basis in political practice, and little contribution to make to political practice. The chapter called "Toward a Socialist Strategy" is an absurd four pages long, and proposes little more than an alliance between tenant unions and labour unions; in substance, the chapter amounts to wishful thinking.

The authors' theoretical range is restricted to Ernest Mandel.

They devote more paragraphs to the problems of great waste involved in building a modern one-person-one-kitchen highrise, and to the consumerist psychology that induces people to want to live that way—topics to which Sweezy or Marcuse would have devoted chapters.

Their sectarianism permits them no concessions to non-marxist readers. There is no Macphersonian attempt to soft-pedal the analysis with nice-guy liberal rhetoric, no attempt to derive marxist principles from the evidence they present, and no attempt to persuade the reader of the validity of any statement derived from previous marxist writing.

For example, the authors remind the reader that although finance capitalists and developers may have their differences, "their interests are not in fundamental conflict...As capitalists above all, both developers and financiers stand together in the same objective relationship to the labour force. In this relationship, their class interests are complementary." To a marxist, this statement is not news. To a non-marxist, it is not persuasive, and possibly not even meaningful.

Another jarring piece of self-assurance is in the brief chapter on "The Impact of Imperialism on Development": "Canada stands within the imperialist bloc of nations," they intone, possibly unaware that this question is subject to debate even among marxists these days.

Some defects of the book probably can't be laid to Trotskyism. A lot of assertions are made which are simply not documented. Do people really spend 40 per cent of their incomes on housing? Says who? Do people with incomes under $2000.00 really spend 60 per cent of their income on taxes? Where did that table come from? Or is that just another typographical error.

And why are there so many typos? Why is the page layout so unattractive and confusing? Why is there no index?

This is the sort of book which deserves to be periodically revised and updated. I hope so, for that might mean that some of the defects could be removed. This is too important a book to be marred in such a way.

New sounds from break-ups

A number of albums have been released lately which feature individual performances from artists once associated with same groups of the '60s and early '70s. Bread, The Youngbloods and Delaney and Bonnie have all been able to generate a degree of popularity over the years, and now the motive forces behind these aggregates have currently released albums which are as musically diverse as the personalities responsible for their creation.

David Gates and his album First Elektra (WEA; $8.29) represent the first bit of good news since it was rumoured on the West Coast that Gates and the other three members of Bread had decided to give the road-game a rest, and effect a dissolution of the quartet which ranked as one of the foremost soft-rock combinations in American pop. The truly exceptional quality of the writing, arranging, and producing on Gates's album displays the values which made Bread such an innovative and innovative rock group. Joining Gates on First are one-time member of the original group Mike Botts, as well as Jim Gordon, Russ Kunkel on bass, and the pianist who made Bread click, Larry Knechtel, who is also credited as being associate Producer on Gates's initial solo offering. Standout compositions are the evocative "Suite: Clouds, Rain", which moves through nine minutes of changing moods and complicated tempo contrasts in true Bread fashion, as well as the sunchy "Do You Believe He's Comin'" which would appear to be featuring the (Knechtel) lead guitar talents that were heard on the hit "Guitar Man".

The news of the breakup of the California-based Youngbloods may have originally been received with a hope that Jesse Colin Young would resolve the differences with Joe Bauer and Banana, but the release of Young's Song For Juli seems to deal a blow to those expectations. Indeed, the collection of sidemen Jesse has assembled on this second of his solo albums (the first was released while the group was intact) seems to indicate that memories of the Youngbloods have been erased. From funky, jazz-oriented tunes such as "Ridgetop" to softer expressions of tenderness for his daughter Julia,

"Song for Juli", Jesse Colin works with precision with his new band. The sidemen are basically Jesse's brother-in-law Scott Lawrence on piano and vibes, with David Hayes on bass and background vocals, and Jeffery Myer on drums. It is unfortunate that Jesse has decided to move into the realm of jazz-rock so seriously, because his forte remains the soft country and folk-rock sounds blended with fine electric lines underplaying the Delta-blues deliveries of his distinctive vocal stylings. Songs like "Country Home" and the version of "Jambalaya", seem more suited to Jesse's style than the heavily instrumented "T-Bone Shuffle" on which the horn arrangement seems to clutter up the track with too much production. It's still Jesse Colin down below the heavy instrumentation and plenty of his magic shows through—perhaps the guitar-oriented Young fans will be disappointed, but several arrangements recall the Youngbloods at the height of their success and these alone justify the album.

Delaney Bramlett, minus Bonnie, has put together an outfit he calls Mobius, and while they may not make us forget the On Tour album which such sidemen as George Harrison and Eric Clapton and some of the other "Dominos", Mobius Strip manages to allow us to forget about Bonnie. Perhaps it's due to the fact that Delaney has such full-throated songsters as Clydie King and Vanetta Fields dubbing in the female vocal fills that were the exclusive domain of departed Bonnie, or it could be that Mobius can collectively evoke some of the sheer assaults of sustained rock recalling the Joe Cocker heyday. On "Circles" and "When A Man Is In Need Of A Woman" Delaney sings out with raw power and on "I'm A M-a-n" the group really launches into a suitable intro to Delaney's tribute to B.B. King, titled "B.B.'s Blues".

Versatility reigns supreme on the Red Rhodes-inspired country tune called "Little Bit Of You In Me", but the most creative arrangement is the final cut of the nine on the album, "California Rain", featuring the string arrangements of Michael Omartian, who seems to be getting a lot of work these days. Delaney Bramlett's album shows signs of being a new vehicle for the blues-rock stylings that once prompted the Beatle's lead-guitar player to join him for a now historic road-tour through Europe—Bramlett and Mobius have an album that is in that tradition.

Dreams from a waxed- moustached major-general

Elgar: The Dream of Gerontius
Benjamin Britten/London Symphony
London

Edward Elgar was an Order of Merit winner, a knight, the writer of the "Pomp and Circumstance" Marches. He liked nothing better than being mistaken for a major-general, which he resembled right down to the waxed, broad moustache. Who would have thought, going on this outward appearance, that he had an inner well of mysticism and religious faith which could produce a work of astonishing beauty?

This work is quite removed from the jolly xenophobia of the Pomp and Circumstance pieces, and must rank as one of the most profound, moving oratorios ever written. Based on a poem by Cardinal John Newman (1801-90), it is the portrayal of a man's painful death, and ascension to heaven. Gerontius confronts the Angel, who tells him he will have a brief moment in the presence of God. Before this can happen, though, he meets the Angel of the Agony, and is rallied at by spirits of dead sinners. In the end, he goes to meet his judgement.

Now, I'm not religious in any way, but the sheer sense of conviction and faith that the music portrays moved me, as it has moved countless others. The largest share of the credit for this must go to Peter Pears, who as Gerontius is nothing short of superb. In Part I, where he lies on his deathbed, the man sounds as agonized as can be imagined; yet when he sings his first lines of Part II ("I went to sleep...") it's as if he is actually experiencing the mystic transformation of the character he is portraying. Pears is 60 now, and as a longtime champion of English music, it must be a gratifying experience for him to turn in such a sterling performance.

As the Angel, Yvonne Minton is admirable, and John Shirley—Quirk portrays the Priest (in Part I) and the Angel of the Agony (Part II) with skill and passion. Neither of them can come up to the level reached by Pears. The man is simply amazing. Conductor Benjamin Britten brings out many aspects of the music that could easily be missed, especially the episode with the damned in Part II. He helps the chorus conjure up an image of frenzy which contributes even more to the dramatic excitement of the work—hardly what one would expect in such a devout oratorio, but not sounding out of place in the least.

In terms of recording quality, I had some doubts about the record. At times the engineers seem to be spoiling the lovely effects of the singers, even drowning out the words to a point where they are all but incomprehensible. Happily, this happens only once or twice; the rest of the record is up to London's usual standards.

This isn't a piece for everybody. If religious works turn you off from the start, then don't bother with it. If you can keep an open mind, though (or even if you're religious), it's unique in all the choral repertoire. I don't think I've ever heard a performance on disc which brought me into the inner design of the music as much as this one did. Virtually the first recording (certainly the only one available), it's one of such stupendous quality that we should consider ourselves lucky.

Just by way of mentioning...my copy had a third record in it: excerpts from Mozart's "Magic Flute". Is this a new policy over at London: it would be nice to get bonus records like this. Seriously, it's quite a nice disc indeed, with some absolutely amazing vocal gymnastics from a soprano not identified on the label.

Dylan Thomas should have written Slipstream

It is an old-fashioned notion and one that galls those who are more involved with making movies than going to them, but, ultimately, the test of a movie is its dialogue. If the screenplay couldn't be re-written for radio, then the movie isn't going to work. To the film-maker, movies may be a ceramic art, but to the audience it's a story-telling. Pictures may substitute for words but it is as pronouns replace nouns; they are the story-teller's gestures. Movies, that don't have stories, fail. It's an informal medium, but it is still a literary one. Characters must talk to one another intelligently or glibly or cleverly or humorously, or appropriately. If the words are sparse, they are more weighty. A movie can be silent much of the time but it mustn't prattle. The rest—colour, image, stars, pace, design—excites us, coaxes us, relaxes us, and if they work, we listen. If then we hear something we like, if we are given a source for inference, then we may recommend the movie to our friends.

So I can't recommend Slipstream (at the Uptown) although I can guess how it won the Canadian Film Award for best picture: it was a decision on points and Slipstream added up best. It's well photographed, in parts daintily photographed and the trick bits fit in. It has a nice tempo, fine music and a resourceful use of sound. Luke Askew and Eli Rill were well-cast and do commendably. It's Canadian without thumbing its nose about it.

But nobody says anything worth hearing. The script is mundane and the characters seem to do things strictly according to device. The movie is set up as a romance, or anti-romance, between a syndicated disc-jockey operating out of a farmhouse in Alberta and a hippy girl who discovers where he lives. The boy is sometimes surly, sometimes attentive, but his moods are brief, inarticulate and disconnected. The girl is given to unprovoked bitchiness. She storms off the farm in the central act of the movie, but if there was a reason, other than dramatic necessity, it escaped us. In Slipstream the contrivance is always too clear and it belies the tale like a badly telegraphed punline.

Concurrent with the romantic conflict in Slipstream is a social one: the dj—honest if self-centred, battles his bubble-gum-recording-toting producer. More words are expended here, which is as it should be: the music business is a lot like the prize-fight business and it is yet to have its The Harder They Fall or Requiem for a Heavyweight. But Slipstream's vague, simplistic allegations of corruption are pretty soft-hitting journalism. The disc-jockey balks at playing less Van Morrison (produced, promoted and distributed by big American money) in order to fit in something else that arrived by the same process. The difference is, of course, aesthetic, but the taste involved is left as unsubstantiated as the romance. We assume the hero knows good music because he lives on a farm and rides his horse naked. The producer can't know music because he is rich and talks in corrupt platitudes. In argument this is sophistry, in art it's pandering. Let the loner disc-jockey argue that he should play what he likes with someone sent to enforce the Canadian content rulings. If we are to watch a symbolic conflict, then let it be between worthy opponents.

Over the year I've noticed that I enjoy tracing the illogic of a film to its basic conceptions, but that's a post-viewing exercise and one undertaken after the movie has collapsed in much more immediate ways—in this case whenever a character opens his or her mouth and delivers a line no cleverer, no more telling than you or I do everyday. Would you pay three dollars to hear your own conversation?

UNDER MILKWOOD, of course, has no dialogue problems. Dylan Thomas' beautiful, bumping radio play is one of the eternally great works of the language, and not only that, it's fun, warning us as it does against boys who bark, and treating us to a whole village-full of characters who, like Thomas' 17-year-old virgin, yearn to sin until they blow up. If there is any problem inherent in filming Under Milkwood it is one of carrying coals to Newcastle: here the picture are truly optional and unlikely to ever match the driving, changing, fantastic tumble of Thomas' lines.

But Andrew Sinclair's movie version at the new Four Seasons Cinema opposite City Hall does well, though not perfectly, with only an occasional tendency to cut to a cat on a rooftop when Thomas mentions one. Sinclair's choice of image adds as often as it detracts, and it has a joyful, nostalgic quality of its own. The excesses (a pyramided midnight dance through the streets by the sleeping characters) are balanced by frames that, difficult as it seems, make Thomas' words cut even deeper and finer. The large cast is universally good although Richard Burton and Elizabeth Taylor may have become too famous to appear in plays not written around their image. Peter O'Toole does not suffer fame in the same way, and does an impressive Captain Cat. And an unfamiliar Welsh actor, Ryan Davies, adds many pieces of inspired physical business. Sinclair's is a much more daring approach to a classic work than Joseph Strick's austere, realistic Ulysses. The two would make a fine double-bill, to be re-cycled at repertory houses forever.

The one difficulty one faces going to a movie Under Milkwood is the unaccustomed demand. It is to most movies, the best included, as Yeats' poetical drama is to the theatre. It doesn't wait for you. Nor does it reveal all its secrets at a sitting. Without pretending it is great cinema, I still easily recommend it, in fact recommend seeing it several times.

Do you want to make something of it?

Manischewitz Concord Wine is for people who find the taste of dry wine about as pleasant as smokers' tooth powder. Make something of it. Like:

Manischewitz Purple Cow

Stir together equal parts of Manischewitz Concord Wine and vodka. Serve on the rocks and add a twist of lemon.

Manischewitz Hi-Boy

Fill a tall glass with ice cubes. Add 3 jiggers of Manischewitz Concord Wine, and fill with ginger ale or club soda. Top with lemon slice. Stir.

Manischewitz Party Punch

A knock-out. Dissolve ¾ cup sugar in juice of 6 lemons. Add tray of ice cubes, 1 bottle Manischewitz Concord Wine and 1 bottle of club soda. Stir gently until very cold.

Record cleaners: good, bad and useless

A question I'm asked frequently is: "My discs seem to get covered with slop, dust, crud, spilled beer, and other effluents too wild to mention—how do I get them off?" Take heart, dear friends, for Uncle David's handy home record cleaning clinic has arrived.

Firstly, do not attempt to clean them with Brillo, steel wool, wire brushes, sulphuric acid or anything with an explosive power higher than that of napalm. These cleaners will probably stain the label in the center, which all authorities on the subject agree is highly unappealing. If you just want to get the dust off, however, I can recommend several methods. They are listed in order of ascending price:

Free: unfortunately, the methods which don't cost anything are probably the least desirable. I don't recommend blowing the dust off, because this puts more of your own saliva on the vinyl than it removes dirt. Another method which costs nothing and works moderately well is washing them, in lukewarm water with a bit of detergent thrown in. Try to wipe the record as little as possible; frankly, this method is best left for the very skilful.

Inexpensive: There is one device which has solved more cleaning problems for people than any other—the good 'ol Dust Bug. It consists of a small stand, which holds up a strip of plexiglass, about six inches long. On the end of the strip is a two-brush arrangement: one brush is cylindrical and wipes the record as it moves around. The second consists of short nylon bristles which catch any specks of dirt the bigger unit has missed. Sitting just in front of the first brush, it is the last cleaning element to hit the groove before the stylus, and if the Dust Bug is started just a second or two ahead of the record arm, your disc will be nearly spotless when the needle hits it.

The Dust Bug is advertised primarily as a static-reducing device, and comes with a little bottle of "anti-static" fluid. While this magical emollient does little to reduce the crackle and pop of static, it doesn't appear to do much harm, either.

Expensive: If your records suffer more from static than dirt (as mine seem to do) then more drastic measures are called for. The finest device I have ever encountered for this is the Lencoclean, a Swiss product which actually eliminates static from the vinyl. It looks like the Dust Bug, but the arm is hollow, and holds the Lenco-Tonic solution which goes at two clams a bottle. No one seems to know just what the fluid is made up of (current speculation points to a tricky combination of isopropyl alcohol and mild detergent—any chemists out there care to do a spectroanalysis of it for me?), but it cleans up dirt and wipes all the crackling from the vinyl, leaving no trace. It's the most expensive system that rides on the record (outside of a few exotic designer-fashionsed items available at the very posh shops) but well worth the investment if static is the main problem you face.

Exorbitant: There are several excellent cleaners that don't ride the disc, and even though they're expensive (with one exception) they fill the bill if a lot of your records are buried in a long-term accumulation of crud. The exception is made by the Dust Bug people (Watts Co.) and is called the Preener. It's a velvet-covered tube about an inch in diameter and about five inches long, and the interior holds a chemically-impregnated tube. To activate it, run water on the tube, thus releasing the anti-static materials through the velvet. Whole Earth Catalogue picked this as the best cleaner made; at $2.50 it's a reasonably-priced solution to a big problem.

Far more impressive are another two hand-held cleaners, the Parastat (made by Watts) and the Discwasher. The 'stat' holds two pads of Preener-style velvet, and between them is a fine nylon brush, similar to the gizmo on the end of the Dust Bug. Surrounding this three-brush assembly is a chrome-plated holder, and a cover slides over the brushes when not in use. At $14, it's not cheap, and I can only recommend it for really heavy-duty jobs. Looks sharp, though.

The most absurdly elaborate unit is the Discwasher ($20 or so).

A solid walnut (!) handle holds in its hollowed-out center a bottle of discwasher solution. You put a drop or two of this arcane elixir on the leading edge of the brush (which is on the top of the walnut handle), and then apply it to the moving record. Once the fluid is evenly distributed, you soak it up by wiggling the brush back and forth on the moving disc. The "capillary action" of the bristles soaks up spilled beer, blood, and so on. Bake at 300 degrees; garnish lightly. Serves four.

There are numerous other goodies on the dealer's shelves which purport to clean discs. Some work, others definitely not. Stay well away from anything in an aerosol can that comes with a little chamols cloth for wiping up the perfumed goo that comes out of the nozzle. Some "cleaning" mixtures have even been known to eat through vinyl, or grow fungus patches in a matter of days.

Next issue I'll be reporting on the worth of Sani-Flush and hot tar: are they really the best turntable lubricants?

Violinist excites from opening G string on

It was over two hundred years ago that the devil visited Giuseppe Tartini in his sleep one night. He offered to do Tartini's bidding and the great composer pointed at his violin, left on the table from the evening's practising. The demon picked up the instrument and played all night, a wondrous music, "more sweet and beautiful than ever I've heard before". The next morning the shaken musician was barely awake as he reached for his quill and manuscript paper to record the fleeting remnants of his strange vision.

The results of that dream, Tartini's Sonata for Violin nicknamed "Devil's Trill", opened Hungarian violinist Marta Hidy's Sunday night recital at Hart House. The work is immediately dazzling by virtue of its inhuman technical requirements, which culminate in that diabolic cadenza of double trills and triple stops. However even if one mentally subtracts the fireworks there remains a fine piece of music, contrasting movements of sweeping pathos and deft wit. Hidy was in absolute control of the piece technically and musically and one only wished that this had not been the first work on the programme. As it was, it showed some of the problems of every first piece, some tightness in sweep and strictness in bow handling, which certainly would have been overcome if it were played later in the programme.

Cesar Franck's Sonata in A major is, along with the composer's Symphony in D minor, a masterpiece of closely woven cyclic construction. Every movement recalls themes from earlier movements but challenges the performer to provide internal unity and coherence in spite of these constant "interruptions". Hidy played the first movement with a beautifully produced "French" sound which was lyric and sustained and reminded the listener of the true musician's ability to approach each composer on his own ground. The freedom of this undeniably romantic piece is really illusory, since all its emotionality is tightly built in. The performer is therefore not allowed to play the work in any other way than the composer intended. Because the slightest amount of individualism sounds exaggerated in this context, this was perhaps the least convincing work of the evening. But even when the listener was not emotionally swayed he could not help but be impressed by the exactitude of every detail and the excellence of the ensemble between Hidy and pianist Valerie Tryon.

Hidy is at her finest in rhapsodic works which combine deep emotional content with virtuosic technical requirements. The second half of the programme began with an example of the genre, Eugen Ysaye's Sonata No. 3 for solo violin. Paganini's Caprice notwithstanding, these Sonatas by the turn-of-the-century Belgian virtuoso Ysaye are perhaps the most important solo violin pieces, musically speaking, between Bach's Partitas and Bartok's Sonata. Hidy's playing was rich, fully exploiting the polyphonic possibilities of this work. John Weinzwieg's Sonata for Violin and Piano, her next selection, was almost anticlimatic by comparison. While Canadian composers are de rigueur on any recital nowadays, the Weinzwieg piece was well chosen. It was short, reflecting perhaps a philosophy of matching length to inventive content. It was one of the few pieces of its kind that I would enjoy hearing again, partially because of Hidy's competent interpretation and partially because of its offhanded quote from the Fugue in Bartok's Sonata for solo violin.

Ending the programme was a work that I associate with Marta Hidy as much as any, the Tzigane by Ravel. From its exciting opening cadenza on the G string to the chromatic pyrotechnics of its finale, this performance held the listener in its power. Just like his jazz works, Ravel's gipsy moods wear a beret and a Gallic wink which makes Tzigane even more fun than a seriously "gipsy" violin piece.

A new headline for Canadian theatrical life is about to be provided with the publication of a quarterly journal, the Canadian Theatre Review. Aiming at being a contemporary focus on Canadian theatre, as well as an assessment of its past and future, the journal will draw on the literary talents of theatre people across the country. The first 100 page issue appears in January and subscription forms can be obtained by writing to the Canadian Theatre Review, Department of Theatre, York University or phoning 667-3249. A year's subscription costs $4.50.

Getting away from the written and back to the performing: the East Side Players are presenting An Evening with Molière at the Central Library Theatre. The show includes two comedies The Versallies (improvisation) and That Scoundrel Scapin, playing until December 1. Student tickets are $1.50. Kaufman and Hart's Once In A Lifetime is currently in performance at the Firehall Theatre. It features three out-of-work actors who descend on Hollywood to make their fortunes in talkie movies. Their feature plan is to open a school and teach the speechless stars to talk. Larry Fineberg's new play All The Ghosts did not open last week as planned but will open Wednesday, December 5, at Theatre Passe Muraille. The Tarragon Theatre's current production Sticks and Stones: The Donnelly's Part One, although overlong, is a masterpiece of theatrical innovation. It combines an historical documentation of the events leading up to the murder of the bedeviled Donnelly family of Ontario within a fantastic mosaic of symbolic representation; miniature burning houses, the sound of a fly, rocks or two sticks encapsulate an entire scene. Sunday afternoons are pay-what-you-can.

Yet another theatre group joins the local thespian scene with the Toronto Acting Company. Their first production, a revival of Lister Sinclair's play The Blood Is Strong, about immigrants in early Canada, opens December 5 at the Central Library Theatre.

On campus Performance Of Our Lives, an original play about special kinds of role-playing by Edward Bean and Debby Nathan, continues tonight and tomorrow night at the Studio Theatre. 4 Glen Morris. Curtain is 8:30 and admission is free. And for those with the odd twinge of childhood nostalgia, a musical adaptation of Winnie the Pooh opens December 21 in the Theatre of the St. Lawrence Centre. It's about your only escape from reality on the Toronto theatre circuit right now.

Former Chicago postman turned singer-songwriter, John Prine, is in concert tonight at Massey Hall. Toronto audiences have probably suffered from over-exposure to Prine in the past year or so — Mariposa for the last two summers, the Riverboat and Massey Hall a couple of times. He's not a dynamic performer but tends to sing the same songs in the same out of tune way. And how many times does anyone want to go through that? A new album called Sweet Revenge, which is quite good in the general scheme of things, incidentally should generate some new excitement and maybe even a few more fans. But if he wants to win his old admirers back, me for one, he should get himself a few good musicians to help him out on stage. Tickets for tonight's performance are $3.50 to $5.50.

day evening concert series at the Victory. This week the acts are your all-time radio favourites, Stories, plus a group called Liverpool. Tickets are all $4.50 and seating is on a first come-first served basis.

A Celtidh (musical gathering of friends) is planned tonight at Fiddler's Green. Tuesday night the featured guest is a girl named Dee Higgins. Fiddler's is behind the YMCA on Eglinton, one long block east of Yonge. Admission is $1 (call 469-3001).

The Good Brothers are finishing up at the Riverboat (922-6216), on Sunday. Townes Van Zant, a Texas singer-songwriter opens on Tuesday. Admission varies from $3 to $3.50 so call first.

David Clayton Thomas opens at Mackenzie's, Church and Charles, on Monday. It's important to note that the cover charge will be steep, at least $4, and the sets short, with long breaks. So make Canada. It's nice to see a change from the normal trend.

Dylan Dylan Dylan! That's all I seem to hear about these days. Well, okay, you rock-'n-roll hot-shots, we've got our own superstar coming into town, and we don't have to wait 'til January! I'm talking about Leontyne Price, who appears tonight in a special Pension concert with the Toronto Symphony. For those of you just arrived from Mars or emerging from a 50-year coma, Price is one of the world's leading sopranos, and has performed in virtually every opera house worth mentioning. Naturally, she is one of the stars of New York's Metropolitan, and has racked up 19 Grammy awards for her numerous recordings. As may be assumed from all this, she rarely has time for us hicks in the bush league, but this is your chance, opera fans! Tickets go for $3, $6, $10 and $15, and will be sold out for certain. There is the slightest, most infinitesimal chance that some may be left; maybe half a dozen at the most. Hustle your body down to

Vallières bogs down in courtroom detail

The Toronto Free Theatre's current production Vallières is a disappointment both in content and form of presentation. Based on the radio documentary by Paul Thompson and Penny Williams, Vallières has been insufficiently theatricalized and is too dated and narrow in the subject matter presented.

What purpose is there really in documenting now the long series of trials and retrials of Charles Gagnon and Pierre Vallières for the bombing death of Thérèse Morin in a 1986 Quebec shoe factory strike? Thompson and Williams confine their play to the legalities and illegalities of the Vallières' trials themselves rather than relating Vallières to the whole complex evolving Quebec nationalist and separatist movement of which Vallières' 1988 sentence to life imprisonment became a cause célèbre. The final question of the play, "What do they want, these Quebecers?", is thus never really discussed and answered.

The fact that there are no actors on stage during the first half hour of this 90-minute production and only one actor for the following one hour further undercuts dramatic interest in Vallières. The audience sits facing one another on raised bleachers in a detached attitude as several spotlights representing the voices of different characters involved in the trial briefly illuminate the semi-dark checker board stage floor. The only props on stage are a tape recorder used for a final up-date interview with the real Vallières and part of a prisoner's box in which Chris Kelk as Vallières argues with and listens to the voices on tape.

But instead of taking advantage of this Brechtian detachment and alienation to make a particular didactic point, the authors of Vallières present a proliferation of undigestible facts that would be confusing even on radio. The inability of Williams and Thompson to synthesize the dramatic elements of the trial and the failure, under Michel Gelin's direction, of the judge and crown prosecutor to establish their characters on tape results in a superficial one-dimensionality that did, in justice to the complexity of the case. As Vallières, Chris Kelk scribbling on a note pad in blue jeans, grey jacket, beard and long hair was too unemotional and uninvolved to make us really believe he was fighting for his life. Only the voice of the actor playing his lawyer Lemieux on tape was completely original in his annoyance and outrage at the illegalities being committed by the presiding judge and crown.

It is unfortunate that Vallières gives documentary theatre a bad name. The final live taped interview of Vallières in French with simultaneous translation into English hinted that the appeal of documentary theatre lies to a large extent in examining historical events from new perspectives involving the audience in ongoing dialectical processes. Many may disagree with Vallières' current support of the Parti Québécois as the only means to independence within a non-revolutionary Quebec. But the importance and relevance of his views lies in the fact that this sentiment is helping to shape the Quebec and Canada of tomorrow.

Vallières runs Tuesday through Saturday at 7:30, Sunday at 2 pm — until Dec. 23. And of course it's free.

sure you fill your wallet before you go.

If you're wondering how to get tickets to the Bob Dylan/Band concerts at the Gardens on January 9 and 10, you should check the one and only advertisement, which will appear in a large daily newspaper tomorrow. I don't have direct confirmation but I'm told that tickets will be around $6.50 to $8.80.

OTHER STUFF — Look for the release of Phil Ochs "Shoot Out At Carnegie Hall" LP sometime in January. The album is a record of the historic Carnegie Hall concert where Phil appeared in a gold lamé suit to a chorus of boos. The A&M record company in the US has had the tape for over three years but hasn't had the guts to put it out. The January release is a Canada-only production, in co-ordination with Ochs. Anyone in the US who wants a copy will have to get it imported from Massey Hall or face the scalpers. Victor Feldbrill will conduct the program, which features Beethoven's Leonore No. 3 Overture as a warmup. Then, music by Mozart, Barber, Puccini, Massenet, Borodin and Verdi fill out the program with the incomparable Price.

The stalwarts of the faculty of music present yet another week of goodies: Sunday at 3 pm is the last of three inaugural concerts for the new organ, $1.50 with your ATL. If up-and-coming talent interests you, check out Helena Bowknan (piano) on Monday night, or Kim Rodgers (soprano) on Tuesday. Both concerts are part of the ongoing series of student recitals, and both start at 8:15 pm in the Concert Hall. Free, no tickets required. Next Thursday evening at 8:30 is John Hawkin's night at the Concert Hall. His piano program features Haydn, Douglas, Crumb, and Carter. Proceeds go to the Scholarship fund and duets are only $1.50 for the student masses.

Just to Mention Dept: you haven't got a hope of getting a ticket, but the St. Lawrence Centre's fantastically popular Connoisseur Series presents the Juliard Quartet in a performance of Haydn, Webern and Beethoven tonight at Town Hall. My beef: since the series of 350 subscriptions sold out faster than a Sid Smith dilettante can say "Capitalist Running-Dog", why hasn't the Toronto Arts Foundation (the promoters) added second shows? I'm sure they could sell out another sitting.

Also at Town Hall this week is the Win-nipeg Piano Duo of Garth Beckett and Boyd McDonald. This is in the Young Performers Series, and is on Thursday evening, tickets $3.50 and $2.50.

The New Music Concerts have the third installment of this year's series Saturday night at the EJB Concert Hall, featuring four premiere performances of new works. For a clam and a half we students can hear what's going on at the tip of the top of the avant-garde. 8:30 pm. db People interested in eastern European studies, either academically or just out of a general desire to know more about a part of the world hidden behind a two-sided iron curtain of biased propaganda might be interested in a new journal being published out of Scotland. It's Critique: a new journal of soviet studies and socialist theory, obtainable from 31 Clevedon Rd., Glasgow, Scotland at $3.00 per year.

The first issue contained several book reviews as well as a discussion of the historiography of the Russian Revolution, a survey of current events in the eastern European countries, a translation of a document produced by Czechoslovaks opposing the group that ousted Dubcek, and several other contributions.

The articles tend to be rather academically written, but they don't presuppose much prior knowledge of the events and situations they discuss. They're all from a marxist perspective. A number of the contributors are orthodox Trotskyists, but the best articles to date have been by those who aren't. At any rate, it seems a promising departure that will shed light on a vitally important part of the world. ud

Well, the Kensington didn't show I Even Met Happy Gipsies last week after all, but they say they will show it this week, Monday through Wednesday with Marjorie. Which is what they said last week. Better phone. SAC finishes off its Captain Marvel series tonight as Captain Marvel finishes off The Scorpion, revealing his identity. With Joe Hill, which we haven't seen. Sunday at St. Mike's, Milhouse, for 75 cents, which is more than he would get many places these days. Wednesday thru Friday, at the Revue Tom Smothers' Get to Know Your Rabbit is being revived, which was supposed to be very funny. Along with It What's Up Doc, which wasn't very funny. And on February the second, the Roxy has booked The Projectionist.

University nixes 24-hour health food store

By ELAINE KAHN

Fourteen frustrated people who wanted to establish a "healthy foods" restaurant, at low prices and open 24 hours a day to give students on campus somewhere to go, are slowly moving out of the building they thought they had bought for their project.

People passing the old Meat and Potatoes restaurant at Huron and Harbord Streets keep coming in to ask "What's Up?" Brendan Caron, organizer of the new restaurant, which he had planned to call "Opening," told the Varsity yesterday.

Caron and the other members of his Karma II group were told to move out in September by R.M. Grimes, of the university's business affairs department. Business affairs had turned down Karma's request to open the restaurant and awarded the contract to another group.

"We knew from the minute we met Grimes that we'd never get it," Caron said. "All you had to do was look at him—he saw our long hair and it was game over as far as he was concerned."

"Our contention is that he's only for profit, not for people."

"He'd much rather have someone come in who'd probably be charging those ridiculous prices again—a place where you go and spend a lot of money for adulterated foods."

Caron said the mark-up in have served "healthy foods"—as opposed to health foods, which exclude meat dishes—at a price of only 15 per cent mark-up from the wholesale purchase price of the foods.

Caron said the mark-up in regular restaurants is 50 to 100 per cent.

He planned on having nutrition charts on the walls and nutrition books scattered around for customers to study.

Also, he wanted to have student entertainment at a "nominal charge" and would have turned the basement of the restaurant into a lounge. The place would have been open 24 hours a day.

"That could have freaked Grimes out bad," Caron said. "It was to us the antithesis of Grossman's—people get bored getting juiced all day."

"Grimes is living 10 years ago, man. When he sees long hair and a beard, he freaks out. If he sees long hair and a beard, he thinks you can't do business."

Grimes, when interviewed by The Varsity, said the youths' appearance, the 24 hour opening and the type of food Opening would have served did not influence the university's decision to kick them out.

Grimes, who thought Meat and Potatoes "was a very good restaurant," said: "We're not pro-establishment or anti-creative ideas. We're just interested in stability for that area."

"They were a little short on experience and we got a better proposal with a group that had 18 years experience in the restaurant business."

Grimes said he asked Caron's group whether they had restaurant experience, they said yes but then couldn't remember which restaurants they had worked in.

He said the 24-hour opening might have upset area residents who "have an important input into what decisions we make. I'm not against it—certainly not."

Grimes said the group the university approved was willing to buy the chattels inside the restaurant from Karma II, which refused the offer.

"They own the chattels that are in the premises and, I suspect, the barn board on the walls," he said.

"We are most anxious for them to remove them. We should have been charging them rent—we're trying to oblige them as much as possible. They were a little legally naive."

"We are pursuing other ways to speed up the process but haven't finalized any decision."

Artistic management refuses to take back arrested workers

By TIM GALLAGHER

The Artistic Woodwork Company remains strikebound today following unproductive talks Wednesday.

Management has "blacklisted" four categories of strikers according to the Canadian Textile and Chemical Union (CTCU).

In a press statement released by the union yesterday the company is alleged to have refused to take back workers who were fired during the strike or those who have supposedly quit.

In addition, the company has refused to retain workers neither arrested nor officially listed as resigned. These workers supposedly have not "shown sufficiently ardent desire to return to work." The company has also rejected two workers who it says were not arrested but "should have" been arrested.

This leaves 31 workers out of 50 still on strike who are eligible to return to work.

Workers arrested during the strike will be suspended until after their trials, and if they are convicted they will lose their jobs, said union spokesmen. So far 114 persons, mainly strike supporters, have been arrested.

Management's unyielding position could contravene two sections of the Labor Relations Act According to the union statement.

Section 58a "guarantees that no employer shall terminate employment because a worker is a member of a trade union or exercises his rights under the Act."

Section 64 guarantees workers in a "legal strike" the right to return to work after six months from the start of the strike.

The union said the company is placing arrested workers in "double jeopardy" in that they have to face the courts and then the company.

In short, the company is "weakening the union" and violating workers' rights to strike, the union said.

Thursday morning's mass picket produced about 70 people. Several people were injured when about 40 police pushed through the pickets attempting to block cars of non-union workers from leaving the plant.

Apparently, the cars arrived before the picket was formed around 6 am.

Blues down Waterloo 5-3 in exhibition hockey

By DAVID COOK

Blues downed Waterloo Warriors 5-3 in an exciting exhibition game Wednesday night at Varsity arena.

In recent memory Waterloo has always provided good hockey entertainment and has enjoyed some measure of success against Varsity with their hustle and physical style of game.

Wednesday night was no exception as Warriors stormed about and kept the Blues scoreless until a quarter of the second period had elapsed.

However extra legs in the third period and the fine play of the Kent Runke, Don Pagnutti and Gord Davies line were the nemesis of a spirited Waterloo squad.

Runke finally found the range with a two goal burst in the third period after outshifting everyone with exception of Warrior's all-star goalie, Jake Dupuis, in the first two periods.

Tom Watt dressed his rookies for the game as valuable Ivan McFarlane sat out with a back injury.

Waterloo Coach Bob McKillop used his talented scoring line of Ron Hawkshaw, captain Mike Guimond and Russ Elliott extensively, with great success.

Warriors drew blood early in the first period as a lonely Guimond parked unopposed in front of Jim Campbell long enough to bang home his own rebound. Shortly afterwards, at the eight minute mark, Guimond resumed his illegal parking and connected with Hawkshaw and Elliott for the second Waterloo goal.

It was obvious that things weren't going well when Watt descended from his usual territory behind the bench for a more intimate view of the action at ice level.

Solid bodychecking and pesky forechecking by Waterloo were the ingredients that made the first period very interesting. Blues were left with only pin-point passes as the Warriors jumped on the blues at every opportunity.

Waterloo goalie Jake Dupuis complimented a good team effort by standing up and challenging the Blues as he stopped 11 shots including one labelled by Fifield, and robbing Runke on a power play effort.

In contrast, Campbell looked slow and was enjoying some luck as he was caught out of position on several occasions.

Play in the second period opened with Warriors keeping the pressure on the Blues. However, five minutes into the period Blues managed to capitalize on the end to end action by knocking Waterloo off the puck in the i own end setting up a goal by Pagnutti, who deflected a hard, accurate drive from Warren Anderson at the point.

Pagnutti scored his second goal with three minutes left in the second period to tie the score 2-2. Once again Anderson assisted on Pagnutti's marker with the other assist going to Davies. Both teams appeared tired as Toronto held a slim margin of shots on goal at the end of the second period.

Runke regained his touch early, with Anderson collecting his third assist. It only took a minute of good forechecking by the Fifield line to tie up the Warriors and force them to yield a goal to Doug Herdridge, assisted by Hews and rookie defenceman Mike Lauder.

Runke doesn't like to let his stick cool off so it was only a matter of time before he rifled a shot inside the blue line that beat Dupuis cleanly on the short side. Al Milnes end with a diving effort that trapped some Warriors and left Runke in a one on one situation.

Waterloo refused to lie down as they kept checking but lacked their earlier zip as their forwards slowed down at the Varsity Blue line and enabled the Blues defence to intercept their attacks.

Hawkshaw continued to be dangerous and his persistence paid off. He broke in alone and beat a sprawling Campbell on his backhand. However Campbell had shaken off his earlier sluggishness and nimbly foiled Elliott when he managed to scoot through the Toronto defence on two occasions.

Anderson, Runke, Pagnutti and Davies were standouts for Toronto. The team indicated that they have the personnel that can competently rise to the occasion of a physical contest.

Warrior Captain Guimond who scored two goals, Hawkshaw, Elliott and Bob Mardley played well in front of a rugged defence. McKillop was on cue when he forecasted earlier in the season that his team would be in the thick of things come playoff time.

Credit is hard to come by if you're female

By PAT NOONAN

WINDSOR, Ont. (CUP) — One woman had charge accounts in several stores. After she was married she asked that her accounts be changed to her new name and address. One store immediately closed her account, and the others sent her application blanks to open new accounts in her husband's name, based on his credit rating.

A woman making $20,000 a year, $7,000 more than her husband, applied for a Diner's Card. She was asked to obtain his signature as her authorizing officer.

One of the banks gave a single man a $1,000 credit line, while a single woman, with the same salary and more capital, was granted only $500.

Another woman in her forties, the head of her family, wanted to buy a home for herself and her children. She was told that to get a mortgage she would have to ask her seventy five year old father, living on a pension, to co-sign it.

A single woman in her early thirties was denied a bank loan to purchase a summer home, although she had the cash for a substantial down payment and was steadily employed as a practical nurse. Her fiancé, who had gone through bankruptcy, had no trouble getting a loan to buy the same property with a smaller down payment.

When a couple applied for a home loan, the wife, 29, was told that in order for her salary to be counted as part of the total family income she must sign an affidavit stating she would practice birth control and planned to have no more children.

This despite the fact that the woman had worked steadily for 13 years, was earning $475 a month and her only child was eight-years-old.

The mother refused to sign the pledge, and, since her husband's earnings were not enough to qualify them for a loan, they lost their new home.

A 1971 survey of savings and loan associations asked how these organizations would credit the salary of a 25-year-old wife with two school age children, a woman who worked full time as a secretary. Of the 74 who replied, 25 per cent would count none of the wife's earnings, over half would count half of less; 22 per cent would give full credit.

Another study was done on bank loan policy. A man and woman, each earning $12,000 and each sole support of a family with almost identical financial and personal qualifications, visited 23 banks to borrow $600 for a used car.

More than half the banks refused to lend the woman money without her husband's signature, or approved the loan only as an exception to their usual procedures.

Several suspected the woman's marriage was in trouble when she said she did not want to ask her husband to co-sign and recommended marriage counselling.

These and other stories add up to the claim that banks, savings and loan associations, credit card companies, retail stores and the government all discriminate against women in extending credit, women in all stages of life...whether single, married, divorced or widowed; with or without children, rich or poor, young or old.

Most of the complaints come from married women. They resent the fact that credit cards are issued in the names of their husbands regardless of the woman's financial qualifications.

A woman who has worked before her marriage and continues to do so after, discovers that marriage cancels out her former responsibility toward money and bills.

She is a non person. Her credit cards are cancelled. She can get new ones in her husband's name, but her past record is not taken into consideration.

Suddenly she is a dependent who cannot be trusted unless Daddy signs for her. Often she suffers from a drop in credit rating and this usually results in loss of credit in her own name.

But no laws exist in any province which prohibit credit being extended to married women. The differential treatment is largely the result of policies and practices arising from the legal responsibility of a husband for his wife's debts.

To many men this is an unfair responsibility. But if women were given a salary for housework and childcare services then they could take care of their own debts.

Until this comes about though, many women have their own money from outside the home and they would like to have credit cards that they can take care of by themselves.

Another area of discrimination is that of loans and mortgages. A married woman's financial status often means little or nothing when she and her husband apply for a loan or a mortgage.

Many banks and lending institutions have simply refused to take into account a wife's income. Consequently, the families have been denied credit because the husband's income alone is not sufficient.

The decision is often based on theoretical future events: the lender conjectures that the woman might get pregnant and/or stop working. Once again, married women become financial non persons.

Many women presented briefs of complaint to the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. This led to the recommendation "that the National Housing Loan Regulations be amended so that for purposes of the gross debt service ratio either husband or wife may be deemed to be the purchaser, and up to 50 per cent of the income of the spouse of the purchaser may be included in computing the annual income."

Such changes have been enacted by the federal government but many other loan and credit granting agencies have some catching up to do.

If married women have complaints, widows and divorcees find a new complication. Whether or not they have worked in the past they have difficulty getting credit unless they have established their own credit record—a feat that is almost impossible, since a married woman can seldom get credit in her own name.

The present rate of marriage breakdown is increasing the number of women who are making independent financial deals.

There is a new consciousness around. Women are standing up and saying that they are people too.

This new consciousness rejects the traditional stereotype of the dependent female who has to be defined by the man in her life.

More and more women are saying that they are responsible human beings who are quite capable of making decisions on their own. The use of Ms instead of Miss or Mrs. says something about their desire to be recognized as individuals.

Mr. is readily accepted for men even though it makes no reference to marital status. But when it comes to a woman, the paramount issue is whether or not she is married.

Marriage would be more popular if it had room for two people instead of one and half. Most women in women's liberation are married, but they do not see why a marriage contract has to wipe out their personhood and individuality.

But there are many other women, not identified with women's liberation, who are speaking up about their lack of recognition. They have seen some progress made in the area of job discrimination. Recent work legislation ensures that women must not be treated differently at work because of sex.

But these work improvements only draw more attention to the issue of credit discrimination. More than three million Canadian women are working fulltime.

They make up one third of the work force, and half of them are married. They see the contradiction. If they are good enough to work why aren't they good enough to get credit?

Credit personnel are very unpopular in women's circles. Maybe the anger is misdirected but they see credit granted as people who stereotype women. All women are credit risks...all women get pregnant...all women quit their jobs.

Being refused credit for reasons connected to sex or marital status has been done locally. But as more for women who never believed that women's liberation stuff before.

Individuals have become angry, but very little large scale organizing has been done locally. But as more and more women exchange stories, the demand for change increases.

Some groups have kept a file of cases where women give reasons for the credit refusal. It doesn't take long to get a list of the places accused of credit discrimination. Boycotting is still an effective weapon for women because of their consumer power.

U of T and Food Sciences: more problems with a will

By PAUL McGRATH

Any decision by the Governing Council to discontinue the Faculty of Food Sciences is bound to cost the University of Toronto a good deal of money, a sum no smaller than $100,000 and almost certainly a lot larger, due to a will clause that may cause as much worry as that of Naomi Bilton.

When the Faculty of Food Sciences was started in 1909 as the Faculty of Household Sciences, the money came from Mrs. Lillian Massey Treble, a member of a family that was quite generous to the university. The university owes Hart House to the same Massey family, as it was erected and named in the memory of Hart Massey.

Mrs. Treble in 1907 laid out over $100,000 to build the Lillian Massey Building that houses the faculty, and also put another $100,000 in trust, the income from which was to be used to maintain the faculty.

Mrs. Treble guarded her money well though, and wrote into the agreement that this money, and its accrued interest, would have to be repaid to Victoria University, of which Mrs. Treble was a patroness, if the university should see fit to "discontinue to maintain the said faculty," on the grounds that its "further maintenance was unnecessary or undesirable."

The will also provides that the university turn over the building and its equipment to Victoria "and pay in cash to Victoria University the then value thereof or of so much thereof as may then be in existence."

According to recommendations put forward by planning and resources committee of the Governing Council, discontinuing the faculty is effectively what the university plans to do.

The intent, however, of the university's recommendations seem unclear. Although it appears the faculty itself will be discontinued, pending a vote by Governing Council, some of the faculty's major offerings will be merged with other courses offered by the School of Hygiene to create the new Department of Nutrition and Food Chemistry.

To clear up any confusion as to whether the university recommendation actually do amount to a discontinuation of the faculty, Food Sciences Dean I.L. Armstrong tapped off a letter to Thomson, Rogers, solicitors and barristers, asking for a legal opinion.

Thomson, Rogers was unequivocal in their opinion:

"The Recommendations are cast in general terms. It is not possible to tell exactly what form the new Department they contemplate will take. It is clear, however, that if adopted they amount to a decision to discontinue the present Faculty."

The law firm cited the dropping of three major courses which would remove 90 per cent of the student enrolment, the fact that no Dean for the faculty exists for next year, and the transfer of staff, as reasons for arriving at their decision.

The law firm continued its arguments on the subject of whether the university is breaking the agreement by discontinuing the faculty as it is. Given the fact that Mrs. Treble was in agreement with the university that Household Sciences was "an integral part of the educational system of the University of Toronto," the Faculty of Household Sciences was established to do the job, but the switching of course offerings to another faculty brings in a touchier problem.

In essence the university's transfer of some of the courses to another faculty assumes that these courses are neither "unnecessary" nor "undesirable" but does assume that the faculty is "unnecessary or undesirable."

"In my opinion," says Robert Reid of Thomson, Rogers, "the university is obliged to continue that programme, if it is to be continued, within the Faculty contemplated by the agreement. In these circumstances, it is my opinion that the Governing Council, should it adopt the Recommendations of October 29, will be in breach of the Trust Agreement and of the trusts imposed therein."

When the decision is finally made the university may find itself not only with a large bill from Victoria but also with a lawsuit on its hands.

Geog masses meet

By ANDREW FALUDY

A Wednesday meeting of geography students sponsored by the geography students' course union (TUGS) could determine the future relationship between the students and the faculty regarding departmental decision-making.

The problem is a long standing one dating back to November 1972 when TUGS and graduate geography students walked off the Geography Council.

The reason given for the walkout was "the lack of student voice in this department and to some extent on reservations concerning the selection of (Professor Jacob) Spelt as the new chairman," a TUGS press release says.

Since the walkout, relations between the students and the faculty have been cool, with the students boycotting many of the departmental functions and social occasions.

Spelt's proposal for a new chairman's advisory Committee of eight members has not been well-received by TUGS (Toronto University Geographical Society) president Charles Morrison.

"Spelt would still maintain the chairman's prerogative to ignore the committee's advice," Morrison complained.

Wednesday's meeting is not merely devoted to political issues, however. There is concern over the department's handling of specialist and non-specialist programs.

"Lack of communication between staff and faculty is definitely responsible for some of the things done with the program," claimed Morrison, in a reference to the dropping of certain courses from the curriculum.

"For instance, there are few advanced urban geography courses available."

Geography students feel the student program has suffered because of the breakdown in relations with the faculty.

Courses on European and pre-industrial urban geography, formerly taught by Spelt, are no longer offered.

Similarly, there is a lack of advanced urban courses for third and fourth-year students to choose from, while the less-subscribed theoretical and quantitative courses were expanded.

Morrison showed considerable concern over the outcome of the meeting.

"It's a make-or-break meeting. Geography students are often left totally in the dark about why they should or should not follow a specialist programme."

"Few of them understand the workings of the department or really get an appreciation of the geography discipline."

Wednesday's meeting, at noon in Sidney Smith, Room 623, is being held to discuss this issue and will also consider what to do about participating on any future departmental decision-making body.

Academic welfare escalates

By DICK BROWN

Honorary degrees are a tradition almost as old as U of T and sometimes almost as confusing.

For instance, this year Rt. Rev. Bruce McLeod, moderator of the United Church of Canada got one, but no one at Simcoe Hall seems to know why or was willing to say.

The university news bureau, Victoria University—whose roots are entrenched in the United Church—and an array of Simcoe Hall officials do not seem to know just why McLeod got the nod this time around.

However, an honorary degree winner of 1969, 1929 U of T graduate Sydney Fisher, not only got his accolade, but the Roberts Library rare book collection was named after his great-grandfather, Thomas Fisher.

In return, U of T got Fisher's $5 million collection of Shakespeare, including: all four folios—which also includes the rare Third Folio, 40 sets of complete works, including every major printing of the Bard from the Folios to day, 200 volumes of source material Shakespeare used, and one of the world's most complete sets of engravings of Shakespeare's London.

Fisher, a Montreal businessman, admits it was not that simple and he might not have given U of T the donation had it not been for a "a remarkable job of salesmanship" by former university president Claude Bissell and former Ontario premier John Roberts, after whom the library was named.

McGill University in Montreal was already after the collection when Bissell promised Fisher a library would be built fit for the Fisher collection.

At one point, Fisher said, he got a dinner invitation and "Bissell, Roberts and half the cabinet (were) there to work on me."

Fisher still dragged his feet but he said: "They went ahead and built the library and gave me my degree without anything in writing from me."

Even Fisher did not like the idea of the Roberts Library that much: "I told Bissell it was going to be a horror, but he wouldn't listen."

Ultimately, officials at Simcoe Hall will tell an inquirer the reason for honorary degrees is something of a secret.

In McLeod's case, he does not have a $5 million Shakespeare collection, but he is a graduate of Emmanuel College, part of Vic, and is a force to be reckoned with in the United Church.

This fall, university president John Evans said one of his high priorities was to re-structure the relationship between the university and the federated colleges, which would include Victoria.

In a working paper presented to academic affairs committee of Governing council in October, Evans called for university departments to be created for each college subject presently taught and certain university subjects to be included in college planning.

The proposals would lead to "minimum duplication and maximization of resources," Evans said.

Artistic bargainers meet today

A back-to-work order which would end the three-month-old strike at Artistic Woodwork is high on the agenda today as provincial government representatives meet with Artistic management and representatives of the Canadian Textile and Chemical Union (CTCU).

The CTCU is hoping to press the government for the back-to-work order claiming the company is a violation of provincial labor laws refusing to rehire workers arrested on the picket line who have not gone to trial yet.

The union hopes to get some indication from the government whether the government plans to enforce existing labor laws or enact new legislation dictating the company let the workers have their jobs back.

Just under 120 persons have been charged on the picket in front of the Densley Avenue plant in North York.

A contract settlement has already been reached by the union and company, but the return to work agreement has prevented the dispute from ending.

Only eight workers of the more than 110 represented by the local have been arrested, the remainder of the arrests being of strike supporters who would line up in early morning hours as police pushed their way through the line to allow cars full of non-union workers to enter the plant.

The CTCU has been on strike since August 21 in an effort to settle a first contract with the firm which specializes in making frames for pictures.

Wages were never a big issue as early on in negotiations agreement was reached for increases of about 65 cents an hour over the basic starting pre-strike wage of $2 an hour.

Three other clauses became the big issues, a management rights clause, an open shop clause, and a union accountability clause.

In the end, the management rights clause was watered down, the company won an open shop clause, and the union won the elimination of the accountability clause which union organizers claimed could have crippled the union.

Since that agreement 10 days ago, there has been no movement by the company in its decision not to allow arrested workers, workers who the company claims ought to have been arrested and workers the company does not want back to return to work.

Worse and worse

Poor Paul Godfrey. It's such a tough life being chairman of Metro Toronto.

First, those awful council members insist on buying him a new $8,100 chauffeured Cadillac even though the new dial-a-bus rapid transit just got installed in his North York suburban neighborhood.

Then, to add insult to injury, those same council members up and pass him a tax loophole yesterday so that now more than $11,000 of his $35,000 annual salary is tax free.

And to top it all off, provincial treasurer John White announces that it's all quite legal.

What's a poor Metro chairman to do?

"We're looking for guys who..."

"We're looking for guys who are creative, have a vision of what's needed in this world — stand by their vision in the face of opposition, misunderstanding — But not a selfish vision — doing things for their own glory but working to change a society that's messed up. The Scarboro Fathers offer one road of bringing this about — a power thing — transforming attitudes. This has been my experience as a Scarboro Foreign Missionary in the Philippines — I learned the Church has the power to do things — not just baptizing, blessing in the old sense — but the dynamics of working with small groups of people who learn to work for themselves — come into their own — become involved — a coming alive.

I don't know if you're creative, or got a vision — but if you aren't content with what you see — and want to do something with your life and the world... maybe your vision is awakening.

Let's talk about it. Maybe the Scarboro Fathers can help you find your vision."

Canada can learn from US: Berrigan

By DAVID SIMMONDS

Canada's salvation lies in submission to the experience the United States has undergone during the last decade, anti-war priest Daniel Berrigan claimed Saturday.

Berrigan, who spent 18 months in the American Danbury Federal Penitentiary for destroying draft files, was speaking at Metropolitan United Church on "Freedom and the Law" to an overflow audience of 1,100.

Berrigan said "some desperate effort at experiment in new ways of being human" is needed. Each man, he said, will have to choose between being an "angel of life," or an "angel of death." The cost of delayed moral change, he said, is continued death in the third world.

In the United States, he said, this had such an effect that no major structure was unaffected. However, his prediction for the future was more "Orwellian nightmares," in which the Watergate affair would rank as an "invisible footnote."

Berrigan, who claimed he was "certainly not rehabilitated" after his prison term, said he found a "great reservoir of human decency" in Canada, which led him to the hope Canada might become a compassionate "counter-society" to the United States.

However, he warned his audience that the poverty level in Canada was higher now than it was 20 or 30 years ago.

He noted Canada was a less violent, more reflective society than the United States. Canada was spared the "filthy burden" of the last decade, although it had both hands dirty from helping the United States by selling napalm, and receiving US military deserters.

Addressing the perennial problem of Canadian identity, Berrigan said Canadians have tried to turn south for the good life, but to themselves for their souls. The process, he suggested, has been painful.

Berrigan, who is currently a visiting professor of theology at the University of Manitoba in Winnipeg, said the recent strike by university support staff there showed the "enormous gap separating performance and language."

While paying verbal homage to human dignity, the university was "supremely indifferent" to the 500 workers who drew "slave wages."

The strike, which ended after three weeks, enabled the union to be its own bargaining agent and brought a pay raise.

Berrigan was introduced by Father Lewis Cox from New York, who, noting Cesar Chavez had recently spoken at the church, said that Berrigan and Chavez represented "distinguished prophets for our times of social justice and non-violence."

Berrigan echoed this sentiment by paying tribute to Chavez. Chavez is leading a "spiritual movement to change the life of all of us," he said.

Anti-war priest Daniel Berrigan told 1,100 people in Toronto that Canada is a "more reflective" society than U.S.

US press condemned

WINNIPEG (CUP) — The tragedy of American journalism is that the press has an "obscene affection" for the official government version of an event, charged Bob Woodward, one of the two Washington Post reporters responsible for uncovering the Watergate scandal.

Speaking at the University of Manitoba Thursday, Woodward told students the government would be immobilized in two or three months if reporters did some digging for the truth.

At present reporters are no more than "sophisticated stenographers transcribing what the administration says" without thinking about what is being said.

Papers are not even heeding the former Attorney General John Mitchell's warning in 1968: "One thing about the administration — watch what we do, not what we say."

Fortunately, Woodward and his co-worker Carl Bernstein worked for a paper not content to accept the governments' press releases as truth.

Given carte blanche and the full support of the Post's owner and editor, the two conducted basic "police reporting" on the Watergate burglary. They began their investigation the day after the June 17, 1972 break-in.

A mysterious entry, H. Hunt-W. House, found in the address book of one of the Watergate burglars tipped them off that the break-in was different from the usual 50 burglaries per day in Washington. "H. Hunt" turned out to be Howard Hunt, then a White House consultant.

When phoned by Woodward and asked why his name was in the burglar's address book, Hunt replied: "Good God," slammed down the phone and left town.

Woodward said this sequence has been repeated "about 55 times" by other top Nixon men.

The two went through exhaustive and sometimes futile investigation. They did not approach men high up but stuck to a low level investigation. "You don't get this background by going to the Sans Souci for lunch with Kissinger. You get it by talking to neighbours, policemen, checking travel records, phone calls, to see who they talked to, where they got their money. Things like that leave their tracks.

While interviewing White House secretaries, the two reporters were told of strange occurrences, for instance: Jeb Magruder, a Nixon aide, was seen running down the hall to the shredder room with a stack of documents. John Mitchell, then Attorney General, was seen entering the offices of the Committee to Re-elect the President (CREEP) with a coat over his head.

A big break in the investigation came when Bernstein was given a chance to examine the subpoenaed records of one of the Watergate burglars. Included were $89,000 in cheques and a $25,000 cheque for a Kenneth H. Dalberg.

Dalberg revealed Maurice Stans, the chief Nixon fund-raiser was to receive the cheques. These cheques, Woodward explained, eventually turned out to be "hush up money" for the Watergate burglars.

Another major part of the story broke when California lawyer Donald Segretti was exposed for his acts of sabotage against Democratic candidates.

These so-called "dirty tricks" gave Woodward and Bernstein an indication that Watergate was not just a burglary or "isolated event" as the White House called it.

They felt it was only one aspect of the re-election campaign strategy of the White House.

On October 10, after nearly four months of painstaking research, the two reporters published their findings. They reported that the FBI had linked the Watergate affair to a "massive campaign of political spying and sabotage."

As was expected, White House press secretary Ronald Ziegler called The Post allegations "hearsay," "shoddy journalism," and "character assassination." These "non-denial denials" later indicated that a solid fact had been uncovered, Woodward commented.

Refugees from Chile will test new clause in act

By DICK BROWN

The announcement by Immigration Minister Robert Andras that refugees from Chile will be allowed to come to Canada will probably be the first test of a new clause in Canada's Immigration Act.

The clause is contained in the same amendments which brought in the 60-day grace period for illegal immigrants earlier this year. It is Parliament's first attempt to define what a refugee is.

Borrowed from the 1951 United Nations Geneva conventions defining refugees from eastern Europe following World War II, the new Canadian legal definition of refugee is a person who has "reasonable grounds" for believing he or she will be persecuted for their political, religious or racial backgrounds.

Brought into effect August 15, it has yet to be tested to any significant extent.

So far, statements from Ottawa only indicate who probably would not be considered a refugee.

Draft resisters and military deserters from any country are not refugees, according to Andras, although he has been less clear on the status of deserters from the military forces of South Vietnam who face death if returned to their home country.

Likewise, a clause in the Immigration Act going back to 1952 prohibits entry to Canada to any person who advocates a violent overthrow of the Canadian system of government.

That clause may cause the most controversy in Canada's efforts to allow refugees to enter Canada.

Toronto freelance journalist Ian Adams, on his return from Chile last week, quoted a surviving member of the personal bodyguard of the late Chilean president Salvador Allende as saying

"You have to remember that police detectives loyal to Allende destroyed most of the political files on the day of the coup (September 11).

"So the best existing files in Chile are now in the hands of the CIA in the American embassy."

Andras said Saturday no refugees will be allowed in Canada if their political beliefs lead to violence, essentially repeating the 1952 clause in the law.

The question then becomes: exactly what will the immigration department definition of "revolutionary" be and whose information will lead to that determination on the part of immigration?

Andras has admitted immigration will be using the usual RCMP security checks—which include a direct computer link-up with the American FBI in Washington from the RCMP computer in Ottawa.

Since the Immigration Act requires immigration officials to make a political determination of whether an application is a violent revolutionary, the success of the Santiago project will to a great extent depend of the knowledge immigration officials now in Santiago possess of the Chilean political spectrum.

Immigration officials now have the onerous task of categorizing applicants into one of the many flavors of leftists who supported Allende.

The method which immigration officials have set up to accept applications gives the Canadian government tremendous flexibility.

Because the applications are being processed outside of Canada, anyone refused admission has no right to appeal.

The recent amendments to the act provide, however, if a person who considers him—or herself—to be a refugee can enter Canada, then declare refugee status, and the possibility of an appeal of a rejection is allowed if the Immigration Appeal Board accepts the appeal.

No such provision is available to potential refugees applying outside Canada.

In fact, immigration lawyers in Toronto indicate it is unclear if a person outside of Canada can apply for refugee status as a right unless the government says they may.

One option the government has and appears to be exercising is having the applicant apply for landed immigrant status, a process which normally takes months before the applicant—if successful—is allowed to enter Canada.

In the case of the refugees from Uganda last year, this was the option the government used and only those refugees who received the traditional 50 out of 100 assessment points were allowed to enter.

Yet there is still wide discretion in the use of the point system. A person who fails to meet the minimum 50-point requirement may still be allowed to enter by anyone from the interviewing immigration officer on up to the immigration minister.

The process of screening applicants gets even more cloudy when the clause of the Immigration Act prohibited convicted criminals is taken into account.

That clause says, in effect, anyone convicted of an offense which is considered a criminal offence in Canada is prohibited from entering Canada except under limited circumstances when evidence of rehabilitation is presented after a certain number of years following the conviction.

Since Canada's diplomatic recognition of the military junta ruling Chile, there has been no clear indication whether Canada recognizes offences for which the military may convict an Allende supporter.

Effectively, the legal structure of dealing with refugees gives the immigration department as much latitude as it might choose to exercise, the only inhibitions being political, which Ottawa would impose.

Hysterical letter distorts discipline issue

Several Governing Council and faculty notables are reacting hysterically to student opposition to the Cadario-Conway discipline code.

As an article in Friday's Varsity states, academic affairs chairman John Dove, law professors John Dunlop and John Swan, classics professor and former academic affairs chairman Ron Shepherd, and internal affairs chairman Marnie Palkin have sent a letter to members of the Governing Council attacking the student opposition.

The letter begins rather humorously: "Members of the Governing Council may have heard assertions that there is student concern about the new proposals on discipline." (Are the university's governors so divorced from the real life situation that they only "may have heard"?)

In fact, the phrase "student concern" is misleading and distorts the real fact: students are opposed to the discipline code through their elected representatives, the Students' Administrative Council (SAC), the Graduate Students' Union (GSU), and the Association of Part-time Undergraduate Students (APUS), and most of the college and professional faculty student councils. To say students are "concerned" is to imply some sort of anxiety and interest in a subject, when the truth of the matter is that students are opposed.

The letter says: "The basic fact that the purpose of the discipline proposals is (?) to protect members of the university community from possible abuses" and says that this has been lost sight of in a "systematic campaign of innuendo and misrepresentation." That statement is a gross distortion. The purpose of the code of behavior is to repress student activism and dissent. What abuses do members of the university need to be protected from? Which members?

The letter gives the following answer: "The most serious disciplinary problems in recent years occurred when, as a result of a dispute about parity, a group of students and others repeatedly and continuously disrupted the proceedings of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science, for a period of several months. In 1970-71, and prevented the business of that faculty from being conducted."

The "students and others" (how's that for an innuendo?) were legally designated members of the faculty council. The "business of the faculty" included ramming through a new structure which not only denied students parity, but excluded them totally from the most important decision-making bodies of the faculty.

The "disruption" initially involved the presentation of a series of amendments and motions. Only after the chairman, Jack Sword, violated the rules of order by refusing to allow these to be debated, and refusing to let his rulings be challenged (who did you say was disrupting?) did the students halt the meetings. And this, according to the letter-writers, is the kind of serious disciplinary problem that the code is to deal with: those in which students take action to assert their rights.

Incidentally, the Caput (the university's present disciplinary body) met in 1971 to consider action against those involved in the protest, but decided it didn't dare proceed because of its unrepresentative nature. So it's clear that the purpose of the new discipline proposals is to provide a "legitimate" mechanism to enable the administration to protect itself against student protests like the one in the Faculty of Arts and Science.

A detailed examination of the points in the letter reveals the bankruptcy of the authors' position. They say: "The discipline procedures were drawn up with great care by two standing committees of the Governing Council and by a joint task force of the two committees. The persons concerned worked conscientiously and in good faith to make the procedures as just and un-discriminatory as possible towards all members of the university community and to ensure that due process would be observed and the rights of individuals respected."

If those really were their intentions, they didn't do a very good job of implementing them. The decision to prosecute rests with university officials, who can selectively prosecute students they dislike. Tenured faculty cannot be dismissed by the tribunals; they get together with the administration and appoint a committee to investigate. Students have no role in this process.

No tenured faculty member has ever been dismissed under this procedure. Discipline cases will frequently involve protests against administration policies; paid university officials will decide whether or not to prosecute, and will impose the penalties. Yet the letter writers have the gall to call this "just."

The most offensive feature of the letter is the way it tries to mystify and obscure the proposals by gibbering over semantics. The letter speaks of a "prosecutor who is independent of the university administration" and claims that this will protect the rights of students. The prosecutor and judge are appointed and paid by the Governing Council. To claim, as the letter does, that such a person is not an "administrative official of the university" is to indulge in irresponsible "doubletalk." Whose interests is the prosecutor going to serve?

The letter asserts students have a "say" in the assignment of penalties. Indeed they do: they can advise, but decisions are made by university officials. What hypocrisy!

The letter attempts to discredit the SAC-GSU claim that the code "appeared in its final form in April too late in the year for students to respond." The authors say: "Work began on the present code of behaviour in the fall of 1972 and successive versions of the code were published from February 1973 onwards... moreover, successive versions of the proposals were made available to student organizations and to members of the university for comment."

These facts are all true, but they gloss over the essential point: there was a major change in the code in April, when the specific prohibitions relating to political activity were introduced. The Governing Council proceeded to ram the proposals through in June, despite the clearly expressed position of SAC, GSU, APUS, and every student governor except Cadario, that the code could not be approved while students were not on campus.

There's still time to stop the code. Students must demonstrate en masse when the Governing Council meets again that they want the Cadario-Conway code repealed because it is repressive, unjust, arbitrary, and discriminatory. Students must oppose the code in the only language the administration has listened to in the past—by confronting the administration with their position.

SAC, GSU, and APUS must assume their proper leadership role in explaining the implications of the Cadario-Conway code and organizing students to fight it. The present code must be stopped now. Let's dump it!

Imperial's tentacles control optical industry

By Bob Gauthier

University of Toronto Governing Council member Sydney Hermant is also president of Imperial Optical Ltd., a "family-owned" company presently under investigation by the Combines Investigation Branch of the federal department of consumer and corporate affairs.

The Independent Optical Association, an organization of minority independent opticians, is one of two companies in Canada characterized by "vertical integration", indicating a firm that is both the largest supplier and largest retailer for the industry (in this case optical instruments and generally, "ophthalmic appliances"). And although it is estimated that Canada's retail opticians only include three companies—Imperial Optical, American Optical Co. Ltd., (the other 'vertically integrated' enterprise) and Basuch and Lomb Optical Co. Ltd.—Imperial, and the various companies controlled by it, have the market virtually sewn up.

Sydney Hermant is connected to more than just Imperial Optical; in fact, Hermant is an example of the 'horizontal integration' of Canada's elite ruling class, connected to the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce (he's the largest single shareholder) and the North American Life Assurance Company (he's a director of both), as well as indirectly owning Paja Realty, a company that buys offices and real estate for Imperial.

Imperial suspected of monopoly practices

Ontario Liberal MPP Albert Roy first broached the question of "monopolistic practices" and conflict of interest by Imperial Optical in the Ontario Legislature on May 18, 1973. The issue was ignored at the time but Conservative Health Minister Richard Pter promised to conduct a behind-the-scenes investigation; he reported in mid-October that no conflict of interest existed between the men who issue licences to opticians in Ontario and Canada's largest optical firm. Potter said: "In going over the records of the board I can't find any evidence to substantiate any conflict of interest as charged."

However, the facts indicate the opposite. There is considerable evidence now available to indicate that Hermant's Imperial Optical and the provincial licensing body for opticians, the Board of Ophthalmic Dispensers, are inextricably bound.

Hermant himself probably realized the adverse effects of damaging publicity, for on May 31, barely two weeks after Roy made his Legislature speech, Hermant dashed off a letter entitled "PROPAGANDA" to "branches, salesmen, and department managers."

The letter began: "Last week you may have seen and heard, through the news media, of a political attack believed to be inspired by a disgruntled optician in Ottawa (but Hermant's accusation has been proven false) reflecting on the integrity of the members of the Board of Dispensing Opticians in the province of Ontario, and the personal and good reputation of this Company (Imperial Optical) alleging that we were exerting undue influence on the board with respect to licensing... Having been out of the country at the time, this is my first opportunity of writing to you about this unfortunate and unfair event."

After a lengthy two-paragraph, morale-boosting section, Hermant concluded: "While no one likes publicity of this kind, the overall reaction has been sympathetic and favorable, and by this time has probably been forgotten by all but our competitors and ourselves. We think we have been wise in resisting the temptation to make a public statement which would only rekindle the flames." Hermant was at least worried, even if he didn't feel his position was immediately threatened. But one could hear the tinkling of broken lenses.

In 1935 Sydney Hermant won a debate on the issue "Big Business is a curse when directed solely by the profit motive." When he is reminded of it now, he smiles, "Why, of course, it's true it's like any of those debating topics. You can just as easily speak for either side." from The Varsity, March, 1969

Imperial chain weaves throughout Ontario

The Imperial chain

Liberal member of the legislature Albert Roy analyzed the Imperial Optical connections in his May 18 speech. Roy was speaking on the Conservative Party's connections with "Big Business", and outlined the government investigations centering around conflict of interest, first in the Fidinam and then the Canada Square-Gerhard Moog-Ontario Hydro links. Roy then proceeded to give the members of the House another example of how the Conservative government "has been kind to its friends, to one company; one company which is basically run by one family, which not only controls the manufacture and sale of eye-glasses but in fact, to all intents and purposes, really controls the licensing of opticians. The name of the company," he said, "is Imperial Optical and the name of its president is Sydney Hermant, a wealthy and well-known contributor to the Conservative Party."

Roy also offered a clearer explanation of how a company characterized by "vertical integration" actually operates in practice. "Imperial Optical makes a profit in every step of the production and sale of glasses. First, the company imports the frames and sells them for a profit to its wholesaler which it owns. It manufactures the lenses for glasses and then sells them at a profit to the retailers which it owns as well. Finally, the retail outlets which it owns sell the glasses to the customers, one again for a profit."

Quoting from a 1948 combines investigation into the optical industry, Roy outlined the extent of only some of Imperial's holdings: "This company, Imperial Optical, is not only involved in the retailing of glasses, it is involved in the manufacture and wholesale of the product. One only has to check the yellow pages of the phone books in towns across Ontario, under optical equipment and supplies, to find that Imperial is in Brampton, Niagara Falls, Hamilton, Kingston, North Bay, Smiths Falls, Sarnia, Oshawa, Chatham, Owen Sound, Thunder Bay, Windsor, Kitchener, Ottawa, London, Peterborough, and right across Toronto of course, at a number of locations."

"...Imperial Optical...has retail outlets of its own in certain areas, such as Windsor, Sarnia, Oshawa, Chatham, Owen Sound, Niagara Falls and Kingston. Then the company substantially controls—and it is a matter of degree in relation to each company—such firms as Braddock Optical, Toronto; Superior Optical, Toronto; Shorney Ltd. Opticians, Toronto; and W.E. Davies Optical, Kitchener and Hamilton. George Nelms in Ottawa is partially controlled by Imperial Optical. Then it controls Modern Optical outlets in Sudbury; Superior Optical Sault Ste. Marie and Newmarket; and Fred Shorney Ltd., in North Bay, Smiths Falls, Barrie, Brockville and Kingston."

"In addition...Imperial runs all concessions in the optical departments in Eaton's stores across Ontario, and that involves quite a substantial number of outlets."

In effect at last count Imperial Optical operated 27 outlets for "optical equipment and supplies" in 20 Ontario cities, and marketed its products through its own Imperial Optical or other brand name retail stores in 51 retail outlets in 19 cities across Ontario.

At the end of May, Bill Omand, president of Omand Optical Limited, public relations officer for the Independent Optical Association, and a former accountant with Imperial Optical added to the list of firms controlled by Imperial:

"At the time I left the full employment of Imperial Optical Co. Ltd. and subsidiary companies on July 31, 1971, they were involved with the following retail locations: Shorney's, Braddock Optical, Superior Optical, F.J. Higgins, Carter Optical, J.W. MacDonald, Thistleton Trading Limited, House of Spectacles, Arthey's, Nelms, W.E. Davies, Sutherland & Perkins, Hornsby Opticians, People's Credit Jewellers Optical, Danforth Optical, Shoppers Drug Mart Optical and The Spectacle Shoppe (Thunder Bay)."

"These are some of the locations, which I remember off-hand, that were owned 50 per cent or more by Standard Optical Co. Ltd. A number of them have several locations and the books and records of accounts are kept at 21 Dundas Square (home of Imperial Optical). Large debts were owing by many of the above-mentioned to both Imperial Optical for purchases and Standard Optical for set-up costs."

"It was Standard's responsibility in each case to check closely each month that each company was purchasing 85 per cent of its supplies from Imperial or associated companies. Meetings were held on a regular basis with the other principals at Imperial Optical to discuss the present and future situations re the above companies."

"Many other independent optometric accounts and dispensary accounts were placed in a position of catering to Imperial Optical through debt situations. The amounts owing by independent optometric accounts ranged as high as $35,000, which had the effect of insuring that many of these accounts continued to do business with Imperial Optical."

"An associated company of Standard Optical was Argus Optical, which was a 50-50 situation

Imperial Optical investigated before

Roy's research into the Imperial Optical situation was made public once again in his May 18 speech in the House. He revealed how Imperial had previously been under investigation by the Combines Investigation Branch in Ottawa, saying there was "possibly a lack of initiative on the part of the federal government in meeting its responsibility there."

Part of his speech is reproduced here:

"...Imperial Optical is dealing with a market which is very extensive, and I would refer... basically to an investigation that's been made by the combines investigation branch in Ottawa. It is a report that dates back to 1948, and at that time they were looking into the question of the optical goods."

"I read from page 7 of this report where it said that it is estimated that one in every four or five persons in Canada wears spectacles. So we can see right away that we are dealing with a very large field. We are dealing with something like about close to five million Canadians. That's the potential market."

"...Imperial has been on the market for quite some time. I would like to read again... from the investigation report dating back to 1948. This was a report by the combines investigation into the alleged combine in the manufacture and sale of optical goods in Canada. Reading from page 8, the report had this to say about Consolidated Optical Co., which is an American company and really operates under the name of American Optical Ltd. in Toronto." (one of the two 'vertically integrated' optical firms).

"Quoting from the report: 'Consolidated Optical accounted for 90 per cent of the domestic production of spectacle frames and mountings and, together with Imperial Optical Co. of Toronto, for about 90 per cent of the basic lens output. Almost all optical goods used and not produced in Canada are imported from the United States. Consolidated and Imperial also have a predominant position in the wholesale distribution of optical goods, a large part of the output to their manufacturing operation pro trade for their chains and branches."

"And on page 10 there is just of Imperial Optical Co. It states trade name under which Toronto, the father of the carries on his business of wholesaling optical goods."

Hermant

Sydney Hermant's position constantly grown over the years for several prominent former president of the Metro Toronto and the Canada.

Hermant also finds time on the Council—on the board of directors, and until his recent internal affairs committee.

Hermant also plays a role in the Management Advisory Faculty of Management Council are many prominent corporations, including General Motors of Canada.

In an interview with The Varsity, Sydney Hermant of the university which he graduated from the same university, "he were as concerned with as they are today (I think) upset about now than in the expressed their concern."

"In those days you political clubs, the Marist societies. I don't think to take over such functions represent students, most concerned through SA was elected SAC president."

He said: "99 per cent"

"The report continues:

"This limited company incorporated in 1921, is controlled by Percy Hermant of Toronto and has interests in many fields other than the regular optical goods trade. Percy Hermant Ltd., or Percy Hermant personally, also controls National Optical Co. Ltd. of Montreal, Imperial Optical Ltd. of New Brunswick, and Imperial Optical of Nova Scotia Ltd. Retail dispensing of consumers is carried on in many centres under various names, including Optical Prescriptions Co. Reference to this report of Imperial Optical Co. will be deemed to include unless otherwise indicated, all Hermant interests in the optical trade.

Imperial Optical manufactures about 50 per cent of the Canadian-made lenses sold in Canada but not more than five per cent of the spectacle frames and mountings. It supplies other wholesalers, but to a smaller degree than Consolidated Optical. It is the largest seller of optical goods to the retail trade, selling through 36 branches in Canada.

"This was back... In 1948, and they have done very well since that time. Again, reading from the report at page 15... It says: 'The optical supply trade in Canada, as has already been indicated, was marked in a period prior to 1939, as it has been since, with the outstanding position held by Consolidated and Imperial Optical. These two companies were responsible for more than 90 per cent of all basic lens manufacture in Canada.'"

Roy also said that some of the methods used by Imperial Optical to obtain control of the companies or to have retail outlets were sometimes questionable. He said, "that when an individual optician tries to open up his own shop he usually receives a suggestion from Imperial that maybe he will require some assistance. Should he not accept the assistance, then a sort of subtle form of what I call business pressure is used—either stores open farther down the street, or maybe there is some talk with the ophthalmologists about sending patients to him."

And Roy added that "in the light of this evidence" he thought that "maybe there should have been an inquiry into the question of a monopoly under the Combines Investigation Act in relation to optical goods. I am very much surprised... that although there has been talk of an inquiry that there has not been an inquiry." But that was back in May. Government sources indicate that there is an investigation of sorts under way. However, the Combines Investigation Branch of the federal department of corporate and consumer affairs is not talking at the present time.

nt said Varsity more exciting than SAC in past vital and explosive issue on campus was The Varsity.

"Varsity editors, who were generally inexperienced and trying to attract the attention of the newspaper world, would attack SAC, or publish some subtle pornography that would offend the Deans of Women," Hermant said. "Two or three firings were about par for a year."

Hermant was known as a "big man on campus" back in the '30's, as president of the UC Lit, a champion debater, tennis star, and president of the National Federation of Canadian University Students (NFCUS).

Hermant said that "NFCUS was much different from what CUS is now (now it is defunct). We were able to get special train fares for students, and during the war, to distribute recruiting information and act as a liaison between the defence department and students."

After the war Hermant hopped to the other side of the administrative fence, serving on the university Senate from 1947 to 1962.

"In the Senate, we dealt completely with the academic side of the university," he said.

"Nine out of 10 meetings would be incredibly dull, but about every tenth there would be a confrontation on basic principle. You got to see things from the inside, and to meet all the academic people."

As the U of T was going through one of its Sydney Hermant in his youth.

most radical social periods Hermant said "students are intimately concerned at every level, but I can't be convinced of the logic of equal representation. Students haven't got enough perspective."

He also saw complete openness for meetings as a false idol. "It's all right to be in public if nothing much happens, but it's too awkward if you have to negotiate, and give and take to work things out."

One of the features of the old university Hermant looked back at nostalgically was small classes.

"It was the best of all worlds way back," he recalled. "Small classes so that you could know your professors. It was the depression, so that many people couldn't afford to come, and some of those who could, had to live in substandard conditions, often on one meal a day."

"Now it's possible to spend your whole career in huge lecture halls and never meet a professor."

You might solve the problem, he suggested, if you took every new-born babe, "removed his tonsils, and gave him a BA. That would get rid of the people who want a degree so that they can get a job and leave room for those with inquisitive minds. The average employer couldn't care less about a degree."

He also endorsed abolition of fees. "If we do it in high school, why not here. I don't like means tests."

TB outbreak at zoo takes lives of 21 animals

By KATHY SIMS

At least 21 animals died during a recent outbreak of tuberculosis at Riverdale Zoo in the city's east end.

They include: two Guanacos, two Barbary sheep, two water buffalo, seven fallow deer, one Barasingha deer, one llama, four Hamadryas baboons and two green monkeys.

Ward 7 Alderman John Sewell said the general manager of the Toronto Humane Society told him "that the TB was brought into the zoo by a new shipment of monkeys and that these animals were being quarantined and treated."

In fact, Sewell was told that as far as the general manager knew, "the zoo was attempting to cure the animals."

There appears to have been a lack of communications between the Humane Society—whose job it is to protect animals—and the officials at the zoo.

Tommy Thompson, Metro parks commissioner, said the 21 animals were destroyed as soon as it was known that they gave a positive reaction to the tuberculin test.

They were killed by an overdose of a tranquilizer drug.

There was absolutely no attempt to treat any of the animals, because, according to Thompson: "There is no proven complete treatment for TB in animals."

"The treatment of TB in animals is prohibited in Canada except under special licence number 10." Presumably the zoo did not apply for this licence.

Of note to nearby Riverdale residents, Thompson stated that although it is rather difficult, the infection could be "spread to humans by close constant contact," and therefore all the zoo staff would be periodically tested by the public department of health.

Although the dangers were slight, it could be spread to wild animals in the Don Valley and to neighbourhood pets by pigeons and other birds who might carry the infection on their feet, Thompson said.

A dog or cat living in the neighbourhood who contracted TB would have to be destroyed because veterinarians are prohibited by law from treating the disease in animals.

The monetary loss to the taxpayers of Toronto as a result of the destruction of the 21 infected animals is estimated at $3,880 by Thompson.

However, he said that "some of these animals will be replaced by suppliers and that others were born and raised in the Riverdale Zoo."

In regards to the treatment of TB in monkeys, an article in the British Veterinary Journal reports the use of a drug Isoniazid in treatment of primate tuberculosis in zoos, with satisfactory result in approximately half the animals treated.

Other veterinary articles indicate certain drugs retard the development of the disease in monkeys but relapses occur when the treatment is withdrawn.

There is no indication Riverdale Zoo attempted to cure the monkeys which were destroyed.

According to an article by W.G. Winkler and N.B. Gale, there have been successful treatments given to antelope in European zoos. These methods apparently were not tried on the various ungulates at Riverdale Zoo.

Unfortunately, although there is a vaccine which can be used on monkeys, it is illegal to use it in Canada, because a vaccinated monkey will give a positive reaction to a tuberculin test.

This appears to be a very callous reason for the death of several of the zoo's monkeys.

Likewise, there are vaccines for other animals but they cannot be used except under licence in research facilities. Riverdale Zoo has not demanded the right to these licences and set up facilities for their use.

Answering an inquiry as to what measures will be taken in the future to avoid an outbreak of the disease at the new Metro zoo, Thompson said:

"It is understood that all animals going to the new zoo will be required to pass a tuberculin test by the federal department of agriculture."

There seems to be no indication this procedure was followed in the case of the shipment of monkeys which Sewell claims brought the disease to Riverdale.

The question is not the need to destroy the diseased animals but rather how the disease got to Riverdale Zoo in the first place.

For those interested, Parks Commissioner Thompson says the monkey-house has now re-opened.

Women authors quoted

By HEATHER SANGUINS

A kaleidoscope of quotes by women authors highlighted a Wednesday evening lecture at Ontario College of Education.

Read by Joan Howard, Melba Croelman and Barbara Martineau, the selections reflected the contents of literature written by women authors and some of their related problems.

These quotes included:

Author Virginia Woolf said in order to write, "a woman needs money and a room of her own." Paradoxically however Woolf's own heroine—Jane Austen—had neither of these two prerequisites.

Generally however the effect of the "deprivation" to which most aspiring women authors are subjected causes a frustration great enough to interfere with their work.

On the topic of truth Anais Nin wrote she had recognized "The dual aspect of truth."

There was a "personal" side, and "another, more objective" side that resulted from a recognition of "one's own subjectivity" and consequently a sifting of perceptions before analysing them. (Novel of the future, 1968).

Commenting on an English author, Woolf asserted: "If there ever was anyone who got himself fully expressed it was Shakespeare" (A Room of One's Own.).

Dorothy Richardson's comment on this frustration and lack of expression was "all women ought to agree to commit suicide" (Pilgrimage).

On the topic of writing Anais Nin wrote: "Writing for me is an art; to me there is no separation of my craft and my life" (Diary: Volume 4: 1944-1947).

On the topic of masterpieces, Toronto feminist writer Viva stated: "Masterpieces bore me" (1973).

On critics Woolf said "the critic of the opposite sex (of the author of the work considered) will be puzzled by any attempt" to change an ingrained stereo-typed concept accepted by society (Women and Fiction, 1929).

On the same topic, critics, Nin stated that "the world of the critic is a masculine one" (Novel of the Future).

About creativity Gertrude Stein noted, if "you remember yourself (as you set out to create something), you cannot create" (What are Masterpieces and Why are There So Few of Them?, 1936).

About gender Charlotte Bronte wrote: "Women are generally thought to be calm, but women feel just as men do" (Jane Eyre).

On gender and creativity Woolf thought it "fatal to think about your sex when you write," and whether you are a man or a woman, in order to write, "some marriage of opposites must be consummated" (A Room of One's Own).

Madness, to Nin was "another rung of awareness" (Novel of the Future). Canadian poet Gwendolyn McEwen states "I do not fear that I may go mad, but that I may not."

Author Sylvia Plath, who committed suicide in 1963 at thirty-one, wrote "dying is an art like anything else, I do it very well."

NDP official wants conservative image for party

By WANE ROBERTS

"We are truest to our principles and to the realities of Ontario politics when we present ourselves as a party of small 'c' 'conservatives'," Ontario NDP Provincial Secretary Gordon Vichert told an OISE audience Wednesday evening.

Speaking on the intellectual crisis which the NDP faces as it rises from the task of basic survival to face the challenge of major party status, the Vichert focussed on two major traumas of the Ontario Party's recent history.

"The 1971 provincial election results were a shock which would have told us a great deal about the history's alienation from the public pulse," he said. The party set out on a crusade in a year when the desire for change was confined to New Democrats.

The public, after a decade of terrorizing changes in their life standards and expectations, wanted security and we offered them more change, he lamented.

"We should have charged the Liberals and Conservatives with destroying familiar environments and the quality of life and presented ourselves as the strongest organization against capitalism's mindless destruction," he argued.

In that way, he felt, the party could have been simultaneously more conservative, more radical and more popular with the voters.

The second trauma, the career of the now-purged waffle, he treated as a case study of the tension between "party" and "movement" which he said has always haunted the CCF-NDP.

There were no differences in substance or policy between the party establishment and the Waffle, he argued, but only of timing and communication. The rub with the Waffle was its behaviour and rhetoric, he maintained.

The Waffle usurped all of the movement dimensions of the party, said Vichert, including many of its dark undercurrents of nostalgia.

Their conspiratorial view of politics, their puritanism and intolerance all bespeak a longing for the starved and tattered proletariat of the thirties. This was the basis for their rejection of affluent trade unionists, he argued.

Their dedication to mass struggle and consciousness-raising reflected a lack of compassion for real people, he charged.

The party must reject these "false gods," he concluded, and in that way, its future as a mass party of democratic socialism will be assured.

EDMONTON (CUP)—"It's not an easy case. It's not like a rape, where you can always find women to testify. We interviewed many of those five thousand women and they sent us packing."

This was the comment of Crown Attorney Louis Robichaud on the difficulty of finding evidence to convict Dr. Henry Morgentaler—despite the fact Morgentaler has publicly admitted to performing more than 5,000 abortions.

Robichaud's statement was passed on to about 40 interested women and men by Anna Cushman, Toronto coordinator of the Committee for the Defense of Dr. Morgentaler, at two forums held last week at the University of Alberta.

The forums were cosponsored by the Committee for the Defense and U of A student's council.

Cushman said; "Finally, the August 15 raid on Morgentaler's clinic got the crown its witness—a frightened, unmarried foreign student, in Canada on a student visa and afraid of deportation."

However, despite testimony that Morgentaler had performed the abortion, the jury found him not guilty.

The jury, Cushman said, was composed of eleven men and one woman. The Crown rejected all women jurors of child-bearing age. The defense demanded a trial in French and a Francophone jury. Cushman said the defense was relatively satisfied with the final composition of the jury because Francophone trade unionists were in the majority.

She said that juries of Quebecois trade unionists had demonstrated that they take political rather than "law and order" decisions.

The defence called only French-speaking witnesses; the Crown gave testimony in English.

Morgentaler's defence rested on Article 45 of the Criminal Code. Cushman said this article was intended to protect people who had to perform surgery in emergency conditions. It states that nobody is liable for performing an operation if it is done with reasonable skill under reasonable conditions.

"The judge instructed the jury that they had to weigh whether this article applied to an abortion. If so, it could override the abortion law section of the Criminal Code," said Cushman.

"The jury found that Article 45 did apply. This means that if a woman wants an abortion, she needs an abortion: she should have an abortion. This also means the jury sees abortion as just another medical procedure."

"Finally this means that we have an unworkable situation, a conflict in the Criminal Code, which must be resolved one way or another."

Cushman pointed out that there is already some indication of how the state would like to solve the contradiction in the Criminal Code. The Crown has moved to take Morgentaler's case to Appeals Court as a "miscarriage of justice."

B'Ball Blues Win Some, lose some

By DAVE PRITCHARD

Varsity Blues finished their pre-Christmas league schedule with a 3-1 record with a 55-52 victory over Ryerson Rams at Ryerson on Tuesday, and a 75-41 trouncing of Royal Military College on Saturday at Scarborough College. Unfortunately, between those two victories, Blues lost their third consecutive exhibition game 79-64 to the Wilfred Laurier Golden Hawks on Wednesday, also at Scarborough. Toronto's final game before the New Year is this Wednesday in the same gym, against the McMaster Marauders.

Varsity's first match of the week set them against the Rams of Ryerson. This Ryerson team is not the same one which has fumbled its way to one victory over the past two years, evidenced by the fact that the Rams have improved on that record by winning games against Queen's and RMC already this year. In spite of the fact that Toronto came out of the game with a win, Ryerson led 34-24 at the half and held on to that lead for three quarters of the game.

The Rams stayed right with the Blues in scoring statistics. Toronto hit 32 per cent from the floor, while Ryerson hit 31 per cent. In foul shooting, it was Varsity with 68 per cent and the Rams with 67 per cent. It was fortunate for the Blues that Ryerson's top scorer, Rick Hagerman, who accounted for 17 points, fouled out midway through the second half. Rams were also without the services of two of their regular players.

Even with these advantages, Varsity had to stall the play in the last couple of minutes of the contest to hang on to a victory.

Toronto coach McManus said he was "impressed with the Ryerson Rams hustle". Blues could have used some of that hustle the following night, as they lost to the Laurier Golden Hawks for the second time this year. (In an earlier match at Waterloo, Varsity lost 100-79).

Toronto could not really be credited with having much of a home court advantage over Laurier, as the Blues had never practiced in the Scarborough Gym previously. In fact, it was really just the first half of play which took victory away from the Blues, as they ended up on the lower part of a 43-29 score.

Some pinpoint shooting by the Hawks, chiefly from the hands of all-star Rod Dean, accounted for most of the Laurier lead, as Waterloo averaged 56 per cent from the floor in the first twenty minutes.

Blues seemed to have difficulty hanging on to the ball, as they made some sloppy passes and lost the ball by some Laurier steals. Even when Toronto had the ball on a fast break, they frequently choked on the shot. On one occasion, Varsity mustered a four-on-one break on a lone Hawk, but failed to put the ball through the hoop.

Both teams used man-to-man defences in the first half. Toronto, who uses a number of designated plays, had difficulty getting their offence moving. They often missed seeing an open man, and when they did organize a play, they frequently failed to get two points out of it.

In the second half, coach McManus decided to try a zone defence, which, combined with an improved Toronto offence, was successful in keeping the Blues even with Laurier, being outscored merely 36-35. Varsity also gave up fewer offensive and defensive rebounds, as they out-rebounded the Hawks 22-16 in the half.

Laurier, however, used their 6'8" centre Dave Lockhart to good advantage, feeding him the ball under the Toronto boards. Lockhart was good for ten points in the half.

Brian Skyvington, who was the most aggressive performer for the Blues, put in his best performance to date, netting 17 points.

Toronto seemed to quickly adjust to the Scarborough surroundings, as they stuffed RMC 75-41 in their next game. Blues, holding a ten point lead over the Kingston team at the half, took no chances, outscoring them 43-19 in the latter twenty minutes.

RMC, readily identified by their scarlet uniforms, matching running choes, and somewhat shorter length of hair styles, at no time provided any threat to the Blues lead. While Toronto suffered from poor outside shooting and lack of zip against Laurier, they reversed their trend, running the ball down the floor on most occasions, and hitting the hoop from various locations on the court. RMC, even though a shorter team, kept ahead of Varsity in rebounding, especially on their own boards. The Kingston team, starting out with a man-to-man defence, changed to a zone with the score 14-6 in favour of the Blues, but reversed to their original pattern when Varsity increased that to 24-13.

Going into the second half, the Toronto guards put a little more pressure on the RMC ball carriers, while the Varsity forwards began to rake in a few more offensive rebounds. The net result, with some good heads-up play by the Blues, was keeping RMC scoreless for a five minute period. Toronto could have added to their total, as on three successive occasions they stole the ball from RMC, took it up the floor, missed on the shot, and missed on three or four rebounds.

Varsity's Scott, Rudmik, Filinski and Birnbaum all contributed to the Blues shooting attack, while Frank Cress, with Scott as well, put in tough defensive performances. Brian Skyvington led the team in scoring for the second consecutive game with 15 points. Skyvington, who picks up most of his points on good rebounding or driving the base line, could pick up a few more points if he worked on using his left hand, saving the extra step needed to go under the hoop or back up for better angle.

TIP OFF: McMaster has five members of last year's fourth place finishing squad (in the Western Division) on their '73-'74 roster, led by all star Sam Kakevicius. Game time is Wednesday, 8:15 P.M. at Scarborough. ...Blues Doug Fox missed the latter two games and will miss the McMaster game due to a rib injury sustained at Ryerson.

Blues shred Laurentian

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

The Varsity Blues, winner of the national championship for the last five years, obviously weren't too frightened about facing Laurentian on their own home ice Sunday.

Undoubtedly inspired by Kent Ruhnke's magical hat-trick (he had Laurentian's baffled goalie pulling pucks out of a previously empty net), the Blues glided serenely to a 7-3 win.

The crowd of 1500 students, miners, rink-rats and peanut vendors sullenly watched Don Pagnutti open the scoring at 1:39. Ruhnke and Anderson gave some assistance on the goal which was duly noted by the officials.

Doug Herridge conspired with Bill Filfield and Bill Hewes to add another Varsity surprise to the scoreboard at 6:38.

Ruhnke, leading goal-scorer for the Blues last year, broke his present slump at 9:53 (E.S.T.) as he netted his first goal of the evening. The ubiquitous Pagnutti assisted in this festive event.

The Laurentian side of the scoreboard got a change in scenery as their quick brown Fox jumped over the Blues' defence and scored. Globensky, for what it's worth, assisted with this poetic arrangement.

The first period ended 4-1 in guess who's favor as Filfield added another for the Blues at 15:42. It got by with a little help from his friends (the singular Richmond, to be precise, was credited with the assist).

The young Laurentian team obviously missed their departed stars of last year - Hamill and Richardson - and began to fall apart in the second period under the Blues' relentless attack.

Filfield caressed the puck in full view of the shocked Laurentian defence and then passed it to the uncovered Richmond who modestly deflected it into the net to make it 5-1.

The rest of the second period was one of those pass-dash-smash affairs. Finally Ruhnke put a stop to this nonsense with only seven seconds left in the period. Graciously accepting a pass by Gord Davies, he blasted (as they say) a wicked slapshot into the top right-hand corner.

At 5:53 of the third period Ruhnke got his third goal on another slapshot which briefly visited goalie Tataryn's pads and then departed into the net.

Towards the end of the game, the Blues got disorganized and Laurentian's Hansen and Rebello squirted two goals behind Jim Campbell in the Varsity net.

Blues outshot Laurentian 43-24, and only outstanding work by former Blues' goalie Dave Tataryn in the Voyageur net prevented his defence from looking any more porous than they were.

On Wednesday, the Brock Badgers are being shipped into town for the sporting pleasure of the Varsity Blues Gun and Hunt Club. Barring objections by the Toronto Humane Society (tel. 922-1191), the gory spectacle gets underway at 8:00.

Readers of the Toronto Sun and all other blood-crazed members of the general public are invited to attend but remember - the ushers will seat no-one after the first ten minutes.

Field house to be built beside Benson building

By DICK BROWN

Huron-Sussex residents will be breathing easier today after Monday's decision by the Governing Council's internal affairs committee to build U of T's new athletic fieldhouse next to the Benson Building.

A task force report submitted to the committee earlier this fall recommended building the fieldhouse on the northeast corner of Spadina and Harbord Avenues which would have entailed tearing down five properties at least two of which are residential.

The committee decision also instructs university architects to put forward two proposals, one for a fieldhouse only on the Benson parking lot and the second to include a swimming pool on the ground floor with the fieldhouse-type structure on top of the pool.

Alex Rankin, university vice-president of business affairs, said there is $4.7 million set aside for the complex which is currently drawing at least $240,000 a year interest.

The two proposals the committee asked university architects for would then come back to the committee for a decision on which to build, depending on money available for the project at that time.

Professor Gary Thaler said it would probably be a year before any construction could begin and perhaps two and one-half years before completion.

The committee decision came during a three-hour session after most of the audience had walked out. At one point it seemed the committee would be unable to come to any conclusion over which facilities to build.

What Thaler termed "a lot of shilly-shallying around" began with a proposal from Jill Conway, internal affairs vice-president, who urged the committee to set a series of priorities for athletic construction to use up the $4.7 million.

Ultimately, the committee decided there was enough money to do the following: reorganize Hart House and Benson locker rooms to permit integrated use; build a fieldhouse with a 200 metre track next to the Benson Building; put in more office space for athletics; and add more squash courts (anywhere from five to 20).

Low on the list of priorities is enclosing the U of T skating rink on the Robert Street playing field.

Before any action would be taken on the rink, yesterday's committee decision would require conversion of the parking lot on the east side of St. George Street north of Harbord into a playing field.

The internal affairs decision still revealed the official approval of the Governing Council on December 20, but passage is virtually assured.

Last month's committee meeting revealed the total price for all the facilities considered by committee Monday would be between $6.5 and $6.8 million.

SAC vice-president Steve Moses told the committee more money is available for the construction of new facilities than Rankin had admitted.

Moses said the university is getting $100,000 for the rental of Varsity Stadium to the Toronto Toros WHA hockey team, and the university had just received $400,000 for the sale of 188 Yonge Street to a Fairview Corporation subsidiary.

Bruce Kidd, one of the researchers for the athletic task force report, said he had received a verbal commitment from the federal government of $1 million for the athletic complex.

Rankin's $4.7 million figure added to Moses' and Kidd's figures total $6.2 million available, plus the minimum interest of $240,000 per year.

Howard Milne, a design engineer in the physical plant department, said the total figure of about $6.5 million did not represent all the costs of construction, only a majority of them.

That compilation of numbers moved Thaler to urge the committee to build virtually everything on the list if possible. Thaler's motion would have committed the university to building the package except for the roof over the Robert Street rink and Olympic pool, if money were not available.

For the following two hours the debate crept along with internal affairs chairwoman Marlene Paikin and Conway steadily reminding the committee only $4.7 million was available and not the larger figure.

The vote on Thaler's motion tied 44 and Paikin, who could have voted to break the tie did not, saying a tie vote meant defeat.

Paikin then introduced the motion which passed and which also set up a rank ordering of construction priorities rather than a package deal.

Evans will meet with fired Salaff

By ELEANOR SIMPSON

University president John Evans has agreed to meet with Stephen Salaff, dismissed part-time mathematics professor, to discuss Salaff's dismissal.

However Salaff says the meeting would take place in private with a member of the Law Faculty present as well as Salaff and Evans.

Salaff believes this means Evans considers the discussion will cover a legal problem and not specific matters or hiring and firing policy.

However, Evans' agreement to meet with Salaff is the first time an instructor not eligible for tenure has been allowed any kind of review of a decision to fire the instructor.

Evans' reply ignored a letter from SAC President Bob Anderson asking for an open hearing with faculty and student representation, and a petition circulating Salaff currently being circulated.

To date this petition has 115 signatories, among them Peter Russell, president of Innis College; Irving Zeitlin, sociology department chairman; and full professors of mathematics Chandler Davis and Edward Prugovecki.

At the moment, part-time staff have no right to appeal a dismissal.

The SAC letter strongly supported Salaff's appeal request and questioned some aspects of math department hiring policy.

No reply to this has yet been sent out nor has Evans acknowledged he has received it.

Salaff was fired from his part-time position last year and later denied reappointment to the extension division.

The firing of Salaff, who is considered an excellent teacher by his students, and the denial of tenure for Michael Mather and David Spring triggered the 11-day occupation of math department offices.

It was after the math sit-in that Salaff was informed he would not be reappointed to the division of extension.

The Forster task force report on academic appointments, now being considered by the academic affairs committee, does not recommend any change from the current policy of no appeal for part-time teaching staff.

It does recommend some minor changes in appeal rights for a professor denied tenure, but essentially it would preserve the closed-door nature of the appeal.

Salaff has said he hopes his case could become a focal point for the issue of rights of appeal for part time staff.

In a letter to supporting faculty members Salaff says his reply from Evans for the closed door hearing "contains no indication that specific reasons for my dismissal would be sought, nor does it suggest that I would be given an opportunity to counter such statements."

"Furthermore, it makes no mention of what procedures and policy considerations lie beyond my submission of evidence to the president."

"This omission is particularly important since I am reluctant to enter into a process of 'nominal' appeal when the structure of this process beyond the initial interview is left unclear, and when the procedure itself does not offer any guarantee that redress of my grievances is a possible outcome."

Bob Greene, dean of the Faculty of Arts and Science, has said Salaff was fired because it is not the policy of the faculty to appoint a part-time instructor for more than two consecutive years.

SAC's letter to Evans says "the mathematics department has apparently violated this 'policy' this year."

"Moreover, no such reason exists for the refusal to re-appoint Prof. Salaff to the division of extension."

The letter goes on to say Salaff's appointment as a professor carried no obligation to do research, so teaching should have been the "only consideration in deciding on his re-appointment."

"His excellence as a teacher of mathematics has been repeatedly attested to by his students," the letter says, "and never disputed by the department of mathematics."

The letter says "Salaff is the victim of discrimination, based on his personal and political disagreements with the mathematics department."

Vic is deciding on surrounding properties

A development consultant firm has been hired by Victoria University to study land development possibilities in the northeast campus.

The property and finance committee of Vic's board of regents retained Project Planning Associates Ltd. of Toronto to do the $23,000 study a spokesman from Victoria University Student Administrative Council (VUSAC) said yesterday.

The area under study is the same area covered by a now-defunct development plan involving Manufacturers Life Insurance. That project which folded last spring, includes the area bounded by Sultan, St. Thomas and Charles Streets.

The VUSAC spokesman said a committee of two students, two faculty, two board of regents members and two administrators is to be formed to work with the consultants.

The committee and consultants' first task will be to find out what the "community response" is around Vic to various development proposals.

"They want to know what kind of shit they're going to get if Vic develops," he said.

This first stage is to begin almost immediately, while students are away for the Christmas break. The entire method of sounding out community opinion has VUSAC upset.

The first phase entails interviewing separately area residents, students, faculty, administrators and other groups around Vic, which VUSAC terms "divide and conquer."

"Last year we had open meetings and we were able to band together" against the Manufacturers Life development proposal, the VUSAC spokesman said. By interviewing groups separately, he said groups around Vic have no chance to discuss any proposals or organize their opinions around them.

Once stage one interviewing is completed, a three month deadline has been placed for stage two, a financial and conceptual analysis of alternatives.

So far, there is no indication what the development alternatives are which Vic or project Planning Associates might be considering.

Haist rules rejected

By BOB GAUTHIER

New College Students' Council has rejected vice-president and provost Don Forster's criteria for the selection of a New College principal. The council will hold an open meeting Friday, 4 pm in New College's Wilson Hall Common Room "to allow the college's students to decide for themselves" according to New College Sac rep Sue Goldberg.

Goldberg said last night that the students' council at a meeting yesterday had rejected Forster's structure plan for the appointment of a new New College principal when the present principal, Don Ivey retires at the end of the present academic year.

According to SAC president Bob Anderson Forster told him that one section of the Haist Rules applies to the appointment of principals — the section dealing with "the appointments of Deans of Faculties, etc." Nowhere does this section mention principals of colleges. The Haist rules state that: "The membership of this committee (in this case the committee to appoint the principal) shall be made public and nominations invited."

Goldberg said, the college council was asked for a list of tentative students' names, and John Ross, New College Students' Council president submitted seven names to Forster. Forster then chose three.

The council is objecting to the fact that although Forster had a choice of selecting either two lay or two "scholars" as representatives, Forster chose scholars for a total of eight faculty members to three students on the 11 man-man body. It also objects to the way in which students were chosen.

New College Students' Council wants staff/student parity on the new selection committee and the three students selected have agreed to resign. The council decided that if students decide to sit on the committee with its present structure they should be elected at large from the New College student body and not chosen from a list submitted to Forster.

What does Victoria College plan to do with these houses?

Credit system closer at St. George campus

An attempt to prevent full-time students from enrolling in summer day courses was turned back Monday by the General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

The amendment to the Berlyne implementation committee report by history professor Jim Conacher was defeated by a substantial margin.

The committee is drawing to a close in its discussion of the Berlyne implementation report which followed last year's review of the new program initiated in 1969.

Though the committee has already passed enabling legislation for a credit system in Arts and Science, much of the debate centred around the desirability of a credit system in which students can progress at their own rate.

Conacher told the committee he was concerned about full time students enrolling in the present six week summer session when these courses are "not comparable".

Some other members agreed with Conacher's amendment which said full time students should be prevented from taking summer day courses until the program is lengthened. However, fine art chairman Fred Winter said departments had control of their own offerings and any course unsuitable for the six week period does not have to be offered.

Student member Robin Dods rejected Conacher's reasoning, stating after taking courses as both a full time and a part time student, summer and winter, there was "no difference in the academic standards."

Another student, Bob Bettson, called the Conacher amendment "an attempt to win a battle already lost." He said the amendment would prevent students from following their studies at their own rate.

A defense of the credit system was also made by dean Bob Green, who said many universities have a credit system and the important thing is "precisely what the nature of the credit system is." He did predict it was "unlikely" U would go on a trimester system.

Green also told the committee, in response to a question regarding funding of college programs, "the budget committee has been extremely short-sighted" in its decision to make no provision for the funding of college programs.

He said constituent colleges such as Innis and New College have "minimal" budgets and their only alternative is to take over existing courses.

Even the federated colleges,

Greene said, have received "inadequate" funding for college sections of large first and second year courses.

The committee also passed a ruling saying as of next year students will have to elect which course will be designated as an "extra" on their transcript by the time they confirm their programs, thus preventing retroactive designation of extras.

Now, if students register for six courses, the one with the lowest grade at the end of the year is designated as an extra.

An effort by one student to maintain the present practice by amending the motion was defeated by a large margin.

An amendment to change a recommendation calling on College X, the new part-time students college, to study the desirability of lengthening the summer day session was defeated.

Conacher's amendment was to direct College X to lengthen the summer session. He said it was needed to "strengthen" the recommendation.

The committee is to continue discussion of the Berlyne implementation committee recommendations in January.

The details of the implementation of the credit system, such as the awarding of scholarships, the fees a student will pay and other problems are being discussed by some of the standing committees of the general committee.

A question by a student concerning the filling of some of the vacant student seats was countered by Bill Foulds who said since the fall by-election had not filled the seats, there was no other provision for seating more students.

The committee has about 200 members and only 52 students. Ten full time student seats are vacant.

A battle for staff-student parity on the committee in 1971 was turned back by the parent Faculty Council which has only 52 students out of a membership of about 1300.

Artistic settles; some may still lose jobs

By TIM GALLAGHER

The Artistic Woodwork Company strike is over after a bitter three-month dispute.

The Canadian Textile and Chemical Union (CTCU) signed the contract at 11 am Tuesday morning.

Previously, the company had signed the contract but refused to allow all the strikers to return to work.

This refusal prolonged the strike by 11 more days.

The management of the two North York plants on Densley Avenue and St. Regis Street insisted four categories of strikers would not be taken back by the company.

Those singled out for exclusion were nine strikers arrested during the strike and two more whom the company said "should have been arrested" but were not.

The union accused management of contravening two sections of the Labor Relations Act and explained management was placing workers in "double jeopardy."

That is, those arrested would have to face the courts and then the company, which claimed it would fire anyone convicted.

Now, however, all strikers can return to work as of today. But a CTCU spokesman said: "Those arrested during the strike will likely be suspended as soon as they return to work."

CTCU will then go into arbitration in an effort to save the jobs of these workers.

The arbitration board will consist of three people: a union representative, a company representative and a chairman who may be appointed by Ontario's Labor Minister, Fern Guidoun.

Arbitration is expected to last six months.

Restrictions insisted upon by the company have been part of a management rights clause the union has opposed throughout the strike.

At first, the company demanded the right to suspend or dismiss employees for breaking plant rules. It also wanted to hold the union accountable for the actions of the shop stewards.

The union won the elimination of the restrictions although the plant remains an open shop.

Wages have never been a big issue. Before the strike, the union had agreed to a 65-cent wage increase over the basic wage of $2 per hour on a two-year basis.

CTCU spokesmen have emphasized they have made no concessions to management. However, the union at the Artistic plants will be a minority of employees. Nine strikers still face arbitration.

Meanwhile, in the courts, Provincial Court Judge Rice, in sentencing a picket convicted of obstructing a moving vehicle, said "I believe a deterrent has to be set" with respect to future strikes.

He fined the strike supporter $200 or 20 days in jail for attempting to stop a vehicle containing non-union workers entering the plant during the strike.

Of 117 people arrested during the strike, only nine were strikers. The rest were supporters.

CTCU expects a tough time in court. The union believes both management and police will press hard for convictions.

The union experienced trouble in mustering pickets during the latter part of the strike. Mass pickets of 250 or more two weeks ago dwindled to 100 or less just before the strike ended.

Academic Affairs remains undecided on tenure

By JIL MACKAY

Following a lengthy discussion, the academic affairs committee yesterday was unable to reach a decision on an amendment to the Forster report proposed by Arts and Science dean Bob Greene.

The Forster report which deals with promotion and tenure recommends two stages of granting contracts in the precarious journey of the assistant professor toward tenure.

Yesterday's debate focused on the report's recommendations about the length of the first contract period, two years. The second contract of three years did not come up.

Greene was concerned about the concept of a two-year initial contract considered for review in the fall of the second year.

It would put undue pressure on the new staff member in his first year of teaching, Greene said. After such a short time, he added, the departmental review committee will have difficulty giving a fair appraisal of the potential of the instructor, Greene indicated.

Many committee members seemed to be convinced of the validity of Greene's argument, but the need for a provision which would enable departments to deal sooner with cases of exceptional neglect postponed a vote on the question.

The biggest problem for some members was what to do with a grossly incompetent instructor if he or she had to be kept around an extra year.

The necessity, said vice president and provost Don Forster, is to have firm legal recourse for the termination of contract before three years if the department becomes convinced it has made a bad mistake in hiring.

Yesterday's discussion was the third meeting the committee has devoted to reviewing the Forster report, which was issued last August. The point-by-point discussion of the report by the committee will likely take some months, as the committee is not even a quarter of the way through the document.

Once complete review has taken place, the committee recommendations will go to the Governing Council for approval.

One of the most controversial clauses in the report — calling for no student representation on department hiring committees — has been deferred to a subcommittee of the academic affairs committee.

That subcommittee has student parity and will make its recommendations to the committee which does not have student parity.

Gov Council backing down: Nelson

By PAUL McGRATH

The U of T Faculty Association has expressed concern to the Governing Council over what it sees as the "willingness on the part of the Governing Council or its academic affairs committee to accede to demands made by disruption or the threat of disruption."

In a letter to the council signed by association president Bill Nelson, reference was made to two occasions last month when university discussions were interrupted by students.

The first occasion was a meeting of the Nov. 6 academic affairs committee, when discussion of the composition of tenure committees was interrupted by students demanding a greater student voice in departmental hiring policies.

The second was the disruption of the Nov. 22 Governing Council meeting by students opposed to the discipline code.

In both occasions, as Nelson sees it, the council acted unwisely in acceding to student demands. Although students at the Governing Council meeting did not have the discipline code rejected by council, a vote on the code which was scheduled for that day was postponed until next term.

"What we are concerned about, and think you should be concerned about, is the precedent set by the Governing Council's apparent responsiveness to the fact or threat of a disruption of its proceedings," the letter stated.

The association feels that the council's accession to alleged threats by members of the university community, or "partisans", as the letter labels those who disagree with certain university policies, constitute a threat to free speech on the campus.

"If a deliberative body is unable to conduct its business free from gross interruption . . . If this is the case, then the elemental conditions necessary for free speech, that is, freedom of assembly and freedom of debate, are destroyed," the letter continued.

Discussion around the discipline code in the past few months has centered on the freedom of assembly and debate for students. Leaders of the fight to reject the code see it as freedom threatened by the vagueries contained in the code.

Nelson added that there was doubt about the effectiveness of the Governing Council's authority on campus, observing that "the new governing structure of this university had not yet established sufficient respect for its authority to throw any of it away."

Canada must admit Chilean refugees soon

The attempt of Chilean refugees to seek safety in Canada and the federal immigration department's response provides a good case study in the mythology of our 'liberal' political system. On the one hand the men wielding the power — In this case Immigration Minister Bob Andras and his boys — say that the law will determine who enters the country while on the other hand the law is itself formed to decide that the men will have to make a political decision.

But far be it for any good liberal — small l or large l — to admit that justice might be decided on a political rather than a legal basis. What the federal government has done, in effect is set the system up so that inevitably it has to make the decisions — decisions that will likely bring strong opposition from the large number of Canadians who are now rallying against the unjust and "ostrich-like" approach of the Canadian government to the very real problem of political refugees.

For example, a clause in the Immigration Act going back to 1952 prohibits entry to Canada to any person who advocates a violent overthrow of the Canadian system of justice. And who will determine this — laws or the federal bureaucracy. If it's the bureaucracy it may be too late; Chile has already seen too much spilled blood for the Canadian government to stall any longer. This clause would mean that anyone who advocated "a violent overthrow" of the Chilean political system might want to do the same in this country. The problem is that there are probably many Chileans refugees who learned from the September coup that violence may be the only way to overturn a corrupt and morally bankrupt form of society.

As we pointed out in an article Monday the method that immigration officials have set up to accept applications gives the Canadian government tremendous flexibility. Because the applications are being processed outside the country at the Canadian embassy in Chile anyone refused admission has no right to appeal. And we have already shown how the present Chilean ambassador, Andrew Ross, welcomed the coup.

Are we to expect that the Canadian government that supported the coup should want to see the same opponents of the Chilean junta coming to Canada to 'stir up trouble'?

Given the paranoia of liberal democracy it is unlikely than any but the most carefully scrutinized Chileans will ever gain refugee status in Canada. Recent experiences with Americans attempting to achieve landed immigrant status indicate the type of "horror show" that Chileans can expect to go through.

As Canadians, we must press the federal government to act in a humanitarian fashion and open

Fernanda Navarro, translates for Mrs. Hortensia Allende (right) who said the Chilean opposition parties knew of her husband's overthrow ahead of time but she did not; "otherwise I would not be a refugee and a widow."

the doors to Chilean refugees before it is too late. Too many have already died in "the stadium"; too many more may die if other countries do not exercise some compassion and "retributive justice."

If, as the Liberal party claimed throughout its election campaign last year, "The land is strong", can't we take the 'risk' of admitting Chilean refugees even if the official paranoia expects them to attempt to overthrow the Canadian way of life?

GAA determines its future, not Simcoe Hall

The university is just now beginning to realize that the Graduate Assistants Association organizing drive is going to succeed. And if it does that means bad news for administrators who would prefer to keep unions out of the university.

GAA president Michael O'Keefe tells us that he and other GAA representatives are meeting vice-president and provost Don Forster and internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway for the first time on Friday at Simcoe Hall's request.

The university has also decided to stop delaying and give the GAA the master list of teaching assistants it needs for its organizing drive.

It must be clear what the university is doing. Now that the GAA has the 700 members required for a certification vote the administration is suddenly concerned with trying to remedy some of the sore points that have cropped up in the last few months.

At the same time the University of Toronto Staff association is just beginning its membership drive. All teaching assistants received applications for membership in the mail.

While we agree with O'Keefe that the GAA has little to fear from this "company union" which openly admits that it is little more than a recognized lobbying group for non-academic staff, we can see that this may be the first indication of obstacles being thrown in the way of the GAA's drive for certification.

The university administration must be aware that teaching assistants are getting a bad deal. Equal pay for more than equal work is by no means the rule for these lower echelon academic staff.

Though faculty salaries have gone up over the last few years, many teaching assistants are still being paid the same wage they were getting several years ago.

Job security and standardized hiring practices are also non-existent. They vary extensively from department to department.

The university administration must realize that if it gives teaching assistants and other would have to re-arrange its budget priorities. Finances are tight and we suspect non-academic staff, library workers, teaching assistants and other campus workers are going to have to tighten their belts.

If the GAA is able to organize then the university might have to bargain with other groups over teaching conditions, wages, hiring practices and many other issues.

After the university's negative response to the teaching assistants' demand for their legal right to vacation pay, it is evident that the GAA can expect a rough road ahead in its efforts to unionize. If the university tries to renege on its obligation to give the teaching assistants four per cent vacation pay, it is easy to see how they will react to much more fundamental demands to give teaching assistants a fair deal.

We hope the GAA is successful in its organizing drive. If it succeeds it will be a breakthrough which will be beneficial to all students. If graduate assistants win more humane treatment and a better working relationship then undergraduates could benefit; presently the teaching assistants do more than 40 per cent of undergraduate teaching as well as a considerable amount of marking.

Naturally we can expect opposition to the unionizing drive. To many people "union" means "strike" and middle and upper-middle class students are not noted for their sympathy to labor.

As a veteran labor organizer pointed out to us last week the path to certification and beyond has never been easy. Whenever workers try to organize, the company does its best to prevent them from doing so.

In this case the company is the university and it is not noted for being a benevolent employer. Ask any under-paid, over-worked library worker or teaching assistant and you'll find out if U of T is really one big happy family.

Riding the island hounds to evict the squatters

The battle at next Tuesday's Metro council meeting over the homes of the island residents has been one of the most poorly understood issues in Metro, if for no other reasons than the slams, innuendos, "red herrings" and outright distortions howling for the attention of municipal politicians.

The most common call from the politicians riding the hounds to oust the islanders is: "Get rid of the squatters."

The problem is the politicians are going after the wrong squatters. Take the Queen's City Yacht Club, which has 2.6 acres of land on Algonquin Island.

Nobody is talking about evicting them, but they have one of the sharpest land deals going in Metro. They rent their 2.6 acres for about $2,400 a year which divides up to about $923 per acre.

Islanders, on the other hand, pay about $100,307 in rent and taxes for their 29 acres, or about $3,458 per acre and residents do not have shoreline leasing rights.

That means that you, the taxpayer, are underwriting the Queen's City Yacht Club to the tune of about $2,500 per acre per year. And don't try to visit the yacht club on the weekend—that's by invitation only—yet you can roam through the island residential areas at will.

That same Queen's City Yacht Club also will more than double its current land holding on Algonquin Island if Metro takes over the islands for parks, and no doubt will have the same sick financial deal.

The upper crust yacht clubs have probably done the slickest job of squatting in Metro. They control 33 acres of prime island land, four acres more than the residential section.

The Royal Canadian Yacht Club has 18.1 acres right next to Centre Island, the most heavily used part of the island and nobody is screaming for that squatter to clear out.

Yet the residential section of the island has recreation areas which are never, ever, filled on holiday weekends, according to the city hall report.

The Great Island Rip-Off is not being done by island residents, it is being perpetrated by the monied aristocracy in the yacht clubs. If anybody ought to be evicted from the islands it ought to be the real squatters, the yacht clubs.

Basically, a South African government has three courses open to it: It can abdicate its responsibility and adopt a laissez-faire policy and accept the chaos which would result. It could attempt to force some form of racial integration of the nation's diverse racial groups, which as matters now stand is a practical impossibility. Conditions just do not exist to make this practicable even if it were desirable, which is an open question. Or, thirdly, it can formalize the existing situation of racial separation, and attempt to do so in a manner ensuring harmony between the racial groups and justice towards all.

The present government has decided to exercise the third option. The government has, wisely I believe, chosen to acknowledge that, due to environment and history, there exist real and important differences between the races in South Africa, with respect to culture, with respect to social system, with respect to ethical and moral values, with respect to stage of development, with respect to aspirations. To lump them all together and treat them identically would be incredible folly. To attempt, under such circumstances to create a multi-racial state would be social masochism.

Due to these facts, the government has instituted a policy of separate development of the races. Now, when I say separate, let me assure you that by this, I do not mean a horizontal stratification of South African society, with the white race at the top. Indeed, this is precisely what the formal policy of separate development is designed to prevent. The purpose of apartheid is to provide a vertical separation of the races, preventing one race from dominating the others. Separate development is designed so that each racial group will have its own nation within one country; each nation with its own government and leaders; a South African commonwealth of nations. This policy recognizes the right to self-determination of the several Bantu peoples, and provides them with a means to full self-government.

As Mr. Voster the South African Prime Minister has said, "Separate development has to do with the right of every nation or group to keep and preserve its identity. This does not only apply to whites, but also to every non-white nation or group. It does not only work to the advantage of the whites, but also to the advantage of every non-white nation or group". The policy then, is designed to prevent a numerically superior, or a culturally more advanced, or an economically more powerful race from dominating others to the detriment of those others. It is designed to prevent the submersion, absorption or eradication of any of the various cultures or societies.

Indeed, properly considered, this is not a racial policy at all, but a cultural and social one. One to ensure that each race can develop its potential in its own way, according to its own stage of historical development, culture, social structure, ethics and moral values. And, this without racial strife and bloodshed, as has resulted so often in other areas of Africa.

Let me take a moment now to make very clear that, contrary to what South Africa's many enemies would have us think, apartheid is not in any way shape or form, overtly or covertly, an attempt to legislatively entrench white racial supremacy or economic domination of the other races.

Taking the first point, one might argue, that for all the talk about vertical separation of the races, it is still the whites who are running the country. This is a fair statement, and one which I feel an obligation to discuss. What exists at the southern end of the African continent is a major Western civilization, a viable and sophisticated, modern industrialized state. Due to the pattern of historical development, it occurs, I believe, that the European races in South Africa are the only people there whose own history makes them capable of handling this sort of a country. South Africa's Bantu peoples are no more capable of handling South Africa as it exists today, than the white government is capable of leading an African tribal unit. Note please, I am not by this implying that I believe the white race to be superior, I do not so believe. I do however recognize that, in South Africa at least, for that is what we are talking about, the white

"There is no racial discrimination in South Africa."

Apartheid not the worst system

Apartheid. As the newly flourishing debate on South Africa centres about that word, we must first address ourselves to the question, "What is apartheid?". Apartheid, or more correctly separate development, is a uniquely South African solution to a uniquely South African situation. Its roots are the roots of South Africa itself. It is the outcome of generations of South African history, and a response to existing realities. Specifically, the reality of the existence of a heterogeneous society of many different races, with different outlooks, cultures, values etc. Any South African government, no matter what its political or racial complexion, must admit this reality and act accordingly.

the long run we are all dead". To turn the government over to the Bantu races at this time is, regrettably, to invite disaster; disaster for themselves, for the country, for the continent, and ultimately for the world. Until they are ready, it is the status quo, or anarchy.

Finally, and briefly, the matter of economic exploitation. One of the purposes of apartheid is to prevent exploitation of non-whites. The separate development policy ensures protection for each group within its own economic field. Without white competition, non-whites have been able to start a wide variety of business and are active in all facets of South African economic activity. A middle class of Bantu has emerged to a degree never before seen on the African continent. The term, "Black capitalism", has a greater meaning in South Africa than perhaps anywhere else in the world.

Further, the government has made great and sincere efforts to assist this development, spending literally hundreds of millions of dollars on economic assistance to the Bantu, directly and indirectly, through support of the development of the infrastructure of the Bantu economy.

The South African government, in a sincere, judicious and progressive attempt to ensure that all of the country's citizens share in the country's wealth, has seen to it that South Africa's blacks are wealthier, better educated, healthier, by far than any of their fellow blacks on the African continent.

For this, and for other reasons I have discussed, the government deserves our support, not our condemnation.

OFS attacks government financing policies

OTTAWA (CUP) — The Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) will present a brief to the provincial government's Committee on University Affairs (CUA) attacking increases in tuition fees and government policy on tenure.

CUA is currently holding hearings throughout the province on the government's post-secondary education policies.

According to Paul Axelrod, OFS research co-ordinator, "the purpose of the OFS brief is to not only challenge the 'cutbacks' policies of the provincial government, but to question the fundamental premise upon which the cutbacks have been made."

The Ontario government has said it is cutting back on educational spending because of the "alarming increase" in educational costs.

However, Axelrod pointed out that the proportion of the Ontario budget spent on education has not increased in the last seven years.

The OFS brief says the government has not taken into consideration alternate sources of revenue, such as higher corporate taxes and increased tax revenue from the impending entrance into the labour force of post-war baby boom people.

The OFS brief also opposes the recent trend to increase tuition fees. In the light of the government's commitment to universal accessibility, this is "a shabby indulgence in rhetorical hypocrisy," the brief says.

The brief also recommends overhauling the tenure system. OFS contends that tenure presently rewards faculty involved in the "publish or perish" system rather than those committed to improving teaching.

OFS recommends a tenure review system by which the performance of faculty members would be reviewed every five years by a committee composed of equal numbers of faculty and students.

Teaching ability should be the most important criteria for extending tenure or promoting faculty members, OFS says.

OFS also demands an end to the policy preventing community colleges from building residences. This policy was adopted in the early days of community colleges when they were intended to service only residents of the immediate area and, residences were not considered necessary.

Studies have recently shown that a large number of community college students leave their own towns to go to community colleges elsewhere and many students are having difficulty finding adequate housing.

Scarborough plays a theatre bargain

Shades of Chris Columbus, but the Varsity has just discovered the Scarborough Theatre Guild. For the mere expense of $3, two frugal students can enjoy some good drama produced by the non-profit organization consisting of occasional businessmen, housewives, etc. whose true yearning is the stage.

The play performed this past Sunday, "A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum", included quite a laudable cast, especially Frank Knight, portraying Pseudolus, who is a remarkable look-alike for Zero Mostel. While the singing was at times deficient, it was more than compensated for by the fine acting, particular mention to Hysterium, Senex and the Proteans. The merriment was sustained throughout and the effectiveness of foils and riff-raff was well demonstrated.

The Scarborough Players next present "The Haunting of Hill House" by Andrew Leslie, December 5-8 at 4130 Lawrence Ave. E. It will be interesting to see if director Lorna Lambert can overcome those problems met by David Rotenberg, (director-writer of Dracula) in simulating the Gothic effect. LeDain report coming soon

The Christmas season may bring a special treat for drug users and abusers from the LeDain Commission.

Health department officials say the final report of the commission's inquiry into the non-medical use of drugs in Canada should be made public by the end of December, possibly by Christmas.

The 1,200 page report contains the commission's final recommendations on the heroin problem, on abuse of such drugs as LSD and 'speed' and up-to-date comments on cannabis.

The report will sell at Information Canada bookstores for $7.95.

The report proposes Canada experiment with giving heroin legally to heroin addicts in addition to the treatment of addicts with methadone, a heroin substitute.

Health Minister Marc Lalonde indicated he and other health department officials were impressed with the British approach, which involves giving some addicts legal heroin, and giving the heroin substitute methadone both by needle and orally.

The publication of the report may eliminate the Trudeau government's excuse for inaction in such areas as heroin addiction, speed abuse, and softening cannabis laws.

For months, the health ministry officials have said they do not want to take any action or even plot a program until a final LeDain report.

Included among legislative delays is the proposed "Dangerous Drugs Act" which was drafted early this year. This piece of legislation would cover controlled drugs — amphetamines and barbiturates, and restricted drugs — LSD and other psychedelic drugs, under the Food and Drugs Act.

BIRKS JEWELLERS

Politicians want U of T to restrict parking

U of T is to be urged by internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway to look into building parking structures despite an appeal last month from Alderman Colin Vaughan not to "institutionalize parking."

A report by Conway to be presented at the internal affairs committee meeting December 17 urges:

"The university develop plans, possibly in co-operation with others such as the government of Ontario, Ontario Hydro, major hospitals, for the construction of parking facilities wherever possible below grade to reduce the number of scattered surface parking lots."

During last month's city-university liaison committee meeting Vaughan delivered an impassioned speech urging U of T to show leadership by restricting university parking in light of the current energy crisis and the efforts to cut downtown car traffic.

Vaughan claimed the university would be eliminating any flexibility by building parking structures and instead urged U of T to set an example for large downtown institutions by encouraging a cutback of cars using a cutback in parking.

However at that meeting, U of T president John Evans indicated the university's policy is to follow the leader rather than be a leader.

The Conway recommendations do not urge a leadership role.

Instead she says "the university (should) seek informed advice in investigating the financial and technical aspects of parking police and transportation planning in the context of the campus environment as a whole."

Her report also recommends "that the university begin negotiations with the Toronto Transit Commission and the government of Ontario to obtain specific improvements in public transit in consideration of reduction of parking on the campus."

Conway says in her report many university people wrote in indicating they preferred driving to campus because of the length of time it took to get downtown from the boroughs.

According to Conway, some said the length of time to get downtown should not be a factor "primarily because place of residence is a matter of individual choice."

If the 112 replies received by Conway's office are any indication, the temperament of car drivers on campus is not to restrict parking.

"A significant number — 14, or over 10 per cent — largely among the teaching staff, question why something they consider a legitimate fringe benefit, a 'commitment' made by the university at the time of appointment, a compensation for low salaries, should suddenly be removed," the Conway report says.

"The university must not act in either an arbitrary or a unilateral fashion. It must clarify its own needs which could be very different from those of a corporation or other employer of comparable size," Conway said in summarizing views she received.

Parking structures drew an 11 to 4 approval, she said. The university's tentative plans include phasing the current 2,000 parking slots into the buildings over a period of time.

Skules lack women

WINDSOR (CUP) — There is a shortage of women engineers, but women who are in engineering are very much appreciated for their work, according to the findings of the University of Windsor's Committee on Women in Engineering.

The committee is composed of four people: two women the dean of women and the director of residences; and two men, the head of electrical engineering and the head of mechanical engineering.

A questionnaire, sent to all companies in Ontario employing engineers, revealed only "one or two" companies discriminate against women when hiring engineers. The findings also show that women in the field receive the same pay for the same work as men.

However, according to the committee, women find it hard to identify with women engineers. To counteract this the committee hopes to bring in women engineers to give talks and seminars.

ritual might well confuse and antagonize an audience unfamiliar with the blend of traditional and personal mythology at the foundation of Yeats' work. Fortunately, Lisa Hicks, in directing this production, has dealt with this problem constructively; by concentrating on the bold colorful patterns of the ritual, she enables the audience to relate to the ceremony in purely sensational terms. Even if we are mystified as to what exactly is going on, we are nonetheless fascinated.

The cast of the production moves, for the most part, with delicacy and precision, and although there are some instances of awkwardness in the staging, there are also moments of breathtaking grace. The technical side of the show, featuring masks, vivid costumes, and stark lighting, is stunning. All in all, this is a brave and illuminating production of a not-too-easily accessible work. If nothing else, it is a good opportunity to get out of the library and see the images of a brilliant poet brought to life on stage.

Roy: conflict of interest exists between Imperial and Tory licensing body

By BOB GAUTHIER
© THE VARSITY 1973

Monday we looked at Governing Council member Sydney Hermant's Imperial Optical firm. Imperial has the market virtually sewn up, and the Combine Investigation Branch of the federal department of consumer and corporate affairs is now investigating the entire optical industry. Today, in the second part of the story, we show why there is a need for further investigation—Imperial Optical and the Board of Ophthalmic Dispensers, the body that licenses opticians, are one and the same.

Dissatisfied with health minister Richard Potter's response to his criticism of the optical industry, Liberal MPP Albert Roy held a press conference August 1 to present his findings to the public. Unfortunately, the 'Hydrogate' hearings were peaking at the time, and, according to government sources, a lone Canadian Press reporter made it to the conference.

Roy indicated at the conference that, as a result of his May speech in the House, he had "received many telephone calls and letters from within the province as well as outside the province, confirming my statements about Imperial Optical. A group of concerned individuals in the optical industry subsequently formed the Independent Optical Association (IOA) to try to improve the situation in Ontario not only for the benefit of people employed in the industry, but also for the benefit of all those people who wear glasses or contact lenses."

However, in his May 18 speech in the Legislature Roy had not only attacked the 'monopoly' practices aspect of the optical industry, but had also attempted to show that conflict of interest existed between some employees of Imperial Optical (indirectly through Imperial's holding companies, such as Standard Optical) and the provincial regulatory body for opticians, the Board of Ophthalmic Dispensers.

The Ophthalmic Dispensers Act

The Ophthalmic Dispensers Act was legislated in 1960-61 as chapter 334 of the Revised Statutes of Ontario. Section five outlines the function and status of the board: "The Board is a corporation and it shall administer and enforce this Act and the regulations". Also, section 1(d) defines "ophthalmic dispensing" to mean:

- "supplying, preparing, and dispensing ophthalmic appliances,
- "interpreting prescriptions of legally qualified medical practitioners and optometrists and,
- "the fitting, adjusting, and adapting of ophthalmic appliances to the human face and eyes in accordance with the prescriptions of legally qualified medical practitioners and optometrists."

Section 2 (1) provides for the appointment by the Lieutenant Governor in Council of a Board of Ophthalmic Dispensers "consisting of not fewer than five members". As Roy has pointed out, the Board completely controls the profession, granting licenses to prospective opticians, setting exams, etc.

The procedure for becoming a licensed ophthalmic dispenser in Ontario (or "optician" in lay terms) is set out in section 7 of the Ophthalmic Dispensers Act. This section states in part: "Every applicant for registration as an ophthalmic dispenser...shall be registered as an ophthalmic dispenser...who furnishes information that he has:

- "completed a course of study in a school of ophthalmic dispensing approved under the regulations and has had practical training for one year in Canada with an ophthalmic dispenser or optometrist, or
- "completed at least three years training and experience in ophthalmic dispensing, at least one of which was in Canada, under the supervision of a legally-qualified medical practitioner, wholesale optical company, ophthalmic dispenser or optometrist and has completed a home study course as prescribed by the regulations, or
- "in the opinion of the Board, the qualifications and experience equivalent to that set forth (in the above) and has had one year's experience in Canada, under the supervision of a legally qualified medical practitioner, wholesale optical company, ophthalmic dispenser (optician) or optometrist,
- "has passed the examinations of the Board,
- "has paid the prescribed fee."

So, as Roy pointed out, "the qualifications for the licensing of an optician are rather flexible, and...the Board of Ophthalmic Dispensers has the power to decide whose qualifications are suitable and whose are not. In practice, the only compulsory part of the training to become an optician is the home study course, which is set and marked by the board. Upon licensing, a registration fee of $50 is paid directly to the Board."

At his August 1 press conference Roy said: "When I spoke on this subject previously (May 18 in the House) I said that most members of the Board of Ophthalmic Dispensers were involved at optical stores owned directly or indirectly by Imperial. The members of the Board denied these allegations and technically they were right. Imperial Optical has a holding company called Standard Optical, whose directors are Ed Bracht, who is Imperial's accountant, and Darcy Kingsmill who is Sydney Hermant's brother-in-law. Standard Optical is located in the Hermant Building at 21 Dundas Square, which is the Imperial Optical head office. It is Standard Optical that controls or owns the retail outlets employing the Board members."

The Board and Imperial Optical

A check of the annual corporate information returns revealed some interesting information and patterns between the Board members and the Imperial Optical network.

Roy first outlined the Board's structure and relationship to Imperial in his speech in the Legislature in May; in August he merely reiterated and confirmed his suspicions. "First of all," he said (May 18), "the chairman of the Board is George Nelms of Ottawa. A well-known Conservative and former mayor of Ottawa, Nelms has six retail outlets in that city." Bill Omand, an employee of Imperial Optical until 1971 said

The last member of general manager of Bracht, which has approximate Braddock's mailing address Bracht, 21 Dundas Square.

Roy sees "a very real" could become the voice believes that "the optician series of courses at a properly trained and licensed and marking the exams extremely easy to become only to take a correspondence the exams which were members of the Board." So basically of opticians hasn't

Just down the street from Bloor St. is another Imperial Optical.

Also of interest is section under the Ophthalmic Dispensers Act states that board members receive a daily allowance of $50 (but any one year) for each "spent in carrying out the Act the Board may pass the remuneration and employed by the Board business of the Board" and may pass by-laws providing reasonably necessary provisions of this Act." it is of Health is paying the expenses connected to Standard.

Roy revealed other information in his May 18 legislative act, the board can either government or can be elected a whole. Section two allows nor to appoint board members states: "notwithstanding the Governor in Council may members by and from a geographical basis."

section 3(2) provided that "as soon as the Board has been elected under this section (3-1), section 2 shall be deemed to be repealed." However, the Conservative government has seen fit to retain all powers of appointment in its hands.

Roy also makes the point in his May 18 speech that "it's a well-known fact that when the opticians wanted an Act, it was Sydney Hermant who came to the government and pushed to get this Act." In fact, in Hermant's May 31 letter (mentioned Monday) to "branches, salesmen, and department managers" he states: "...it was through representations made by this company (Imperial Optical) some 12 years ago, in which I was personally involved, that an Opticians' Act came into force in the Province of Ontario, and that reasonable licensing arrangements were instituted for the first time by the provincial government." However, the Act appears to be little more than a legal licence to steal.

The Board may have over-stepped its powers

In his August press conference Roy criticized the Board for "issuing student licences when there is no provision in the Act to allow this. A student licence therefore is the invention of the Board. I have never heard of any profession issuing student licences to its students. The Board seems to have little or no regard for the Act it is supposed to enforce and takes the liberty of making its own rules.

"Not only does it invent new regulations for the licensing of opticians, it also does little or nothing to enforce the Act by which it is supposedly governed." Section 12 of the Act states that "except as otherwise provided in this Act, no person, other than an ophthalmic dispenser, shall (a) practise ophthalmic dispensing, (b) prepare or dispense prescriptions of legally qualified medical practitioners or optometrists for ophthalmic appliances" (c) offer for sale or sell ophthalmic appliances." Roy claimed that the Board had the power to take disciplinary action against any person who contravenes the Act. But in the 12 year history of the Board there has been only one prosecution... the man who was convicted of dispensing without a licence was not working for a retail outlet owned by Imperial.

"It is well known in the industry," Roy said, "that many people do dispense glasses without being licensed opticians." He continued: "Just to prove this point, the (Independent Optical Association sent some people out to do some 'shopping' and as a result three pairs of glasses were dispensed by unlicensed personnel."

Roy presented three affidavits signed by Myer
Cohen, proving that the persons who fitted, adjusted and adapted Cohen's eyeglasses were not licensed opticians. Cohen had visited three stores between July 28 and July 31, and received identical treatment. The stores involved were People's Optical, 142 Yonge St., Toronto Dominion Centre Optical, and Shorney's Optical in Sherway Gardens. It will be interesting to see whether the Board of Ophthalmic Dispensers will prosecute Shorney's under section 12 of the Act.
Roy said August 1, that "it is horrifying to think that the unsuspecting public is being served by unlicensed people in an area as important as this one. It is the Board's duty to discipline these people, and obviously the Board is not doing its duty in this regard."

But, as Roy also said, "not only does the Board make new regulations and disregard old ones, it also contravenes certain parts of the Act. Section 20 states: 'Nothing in this Act authorizes the Board to regulate, control, or interfere with the prices that may be charged for ophthalmic appliances or the terms upon which the charges of fees may be paid.'"

However, Roy presented a letter dated July 17, 1972, which the Board of Ophthalmic Dispensers sent out to opticians outlining a schedule of fees for work done for the Workmen's Compensation Board. "In other words," he said, "if a worker broke his glasses and the Workmen's Compensation Board was obliged to pay for replacement glasses, the optician would have to provide those glasses to the compensation board at the price set by the Board of Ophthalmic Dispensers." But "this board is a government-appointed body to regulate the licensing and training of opticians; it has no authority to regulate dispensing fees or even to discuss them with the Workmen's Compensation Board."

The Board may also have neglected its duties on yet another occasion. Section 11 (1) of Regulation 650 under the Ophthalmic Dispensers Act stipulates that: "the Board or its representatives shall prepare the examination questions and shall conduct and preside over the examinations at the time and place fixed by the Board." However, in July, 1967, Larry Neims, son of Board member George Neims, wrote an examination under the supervision of a "Joe Boyle" at Sutherland & Parkins Optical Co. Ltd., 137 Sparks Street, Ottawa. On the most recent corporation information return, Sutherland & Parkins gives as its mailing address: care of E.A. Bracht, Suite 401, 21 Dundas Square. One branch of George H. Neims Ltd. is located just down the street from Sutherland &

The Varsity—Bob Gauthier

Liberal MPP Albert Roy said in the House that "when an individual optician tries to open up his own shop he usually receives a suggestion from Imperial that maybe he will require some assistance. Should he not accept the assistance, then a sort of subtle form of what I call business pressure is used... stores open farther down the street..." A good example is J. C.
Williams Optician, located about 100 yards east of Braddock optical at 268 Bloor St. West.

Parkins at 67 Sparks St., Ottawa.

On this particular occasion Fred Dalby, secretary treasurer and registrar of the Board of Ophthalmic Dispensers wrote to Boyle. He said in part: "It is most necessary that there be strict supervision so that there can be no accusation of favoritism in this particular case, therefore, I would appreciate you taking special care in the handling of the situation." Whatever that means.
However, once again the Board seems to have "stretched" the intent of the Act and with it, the rules of the game.

A final criticism Roy has of the Board is that "it does not send out financial statements to licensed opticians. The Board receives revenue from registration fees, correspondence course fees, examination fees and graduation certificates as well as interest income. However, opticians are never informed as to how the money they pay to the Board is spent. Other professions send financial statements to its members and I believe the Board of Ophthalmic Dispensers should do the same."

Tories are dragging their heels

During his August 1 press conference Roy mentioned that "the Committee On the Healing Arts recognized the need for educational reform in this profession and recommended 'that the Department of Education encourage the development of a formal training program for ophthalmic dispensers in either a College of Applied Arts and Technology or a technical school, and that the requirements for licensing of ophthalmic dispensers be changed to include such a training program and to provide for the licensing of its graduates as ophthalmic dispensers, provided that they serve a further period of one year under the direction of a licensed ophthalmic dispenser or other appropriate person as the legislation may permit."

"The Healing Arts Report also recommended taking the licensing power away from the Board of Ophthalmic Dispensers and 'that ophthalmic dispensers be licensed by the Health Disciplines Regulation Board through a Division for ophthalmic dispensers.'"

Comments provided by the Independent Optical Association (IOA) about the state of the industry in Canada are more severe. The IOA was one of the first groups to bring up the question of 'vertical integration' in the industry. It revealed that anti-trust actions had been brought against American Optical in the United States by the Department of Justice over a period of years extending from 1940 to 1966. The IOA also pointed out in one document that "the same control that was exercised in Canada by these two firms (Imperial Optical and American Optical) in the 1940's through patents and patent licences is now exercised through vertical integration. The detrimental effect of this control on competition in the optical goods industry is much the same today as it was then. But the effect is more serious since control by integration is more permanent than control by patents."

"The control of the dominant verticals and the manner in which this control is exercised may constitute on the part of these firms, singly or together or with others, conspiracy and monopoly under the Combines Investigation Act. As to the arrangements constituting conspiracy they are primarily vertical, that is to say, they are primarily arrangements among firms at different levels in the industry such as arrangements between Imperial Optical and retailers. The behaviour of the dominant verticals may also violate the merger and price discrimination sections of the Act."

"The optical goods industry is part of the health care industry. As such it is affected with a public interest. This interest is protected at the provincial level through provincial licensing statutes regulating ophthalmologists, optometrists and opticians. These statutes, although intended to control the professional personnel on the service side of the industry, also affect the degree of competition in the manufacture and sale of optical goods. Because of this connection it is possible for the dominant verticals to use the provincial legislation to lessen the degree of competition in the supply of optical goods. Since the statutes vary from province to province no generalization is capable regarding the extent to which the dominant verticals use the provincial legislation in this way. Nevertheless it is clear that although there need not be any conflict between provincial legislation to protect the public interest in the care of eyes and federal legislation to protect the public interest in competition in the supply of optical goods, the dominant verticals can and do make use of the provincial legislation to injure the public interest in competition."

"The public interest in competition will only be served if the control of the dominant verticals is broken up. The Association believes that a decree under section 30 of the Combines Investigation Act like the US decree of 1966 against American Optical is necessary to accomplish this result. A fairly complicated decree might be required to be effective. However, a beginning on a healthier industry would be made if the dominant manufacturers were required to divest themselves of all interest in retailing and prohibited from further acquisitions in that end of the market. A direction under section 28 of the Act might also help."

In October Health Minister Richard Potter told the legislature that he had investigated reported direct or indirect connections between members of the Ophthalmic Dispensing Board and Imperial Optical Co. Ltd. He said: "In going over the records of the Board I can't find any evidence to substantiate any conflict of interest as charged."
Potter said that he was not aware of any other business links between members of the Board and Imperial Optical.

Unions argue on revitalization and a change of leadership

By ELSPETH GUILD and CAM FORD

CANADIAN UNIVERSITY PRESS

While the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) has called for a drastic change in the Canadian Labor Congress (CLC) on the grounds that it is unresponsive to its members and too highly centralized, the executive of CUPE pushed through a series of resolutions that severely curtail the rights and powers of its own individual locals.

The CUPE national convention, last week (Nov. 26-30) in Montreal, voted overwhelmingly in favor of maintaining its membership in the CLC if the congress embarks on a program of "reform, revitalization and change of leadership".

This is a result of a dispute between CUPE and the leadership of the CLC which grew out of the CLC decision to grant direct affiliation to three provincial associations, contravening an agreement set up by the CLC giving CUPE, the largest Canadian union, jurisdiction over public employees.

While presenting the emergency resolution to the floor, the CUPE executive also announced a united front amongst CUPE, the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers (CBRT) and the Public Service Alliance of Canada (PSAC) which supports CUPE in its fight with the national labor congress.

The front has published a working paper that supposedly lays down the reforms necessary to retain the 185,000 members of CUPE, approximately 10 per cent of the total membership of the CLC.

While there are five points to the paper, it is more words than an actual policy.

The outline includes Standards for Better Trade Unionism, Canadian Control, Rationalization of Jurisdiction, Combating the Multi-national corporations and the reorganization of the congress departments and offices. The most important issue lies with jurisdiction.

In rationalization, the congress is going to have to backtrack on its admitting three provincial associations and make them become locals of CUPE. This is because of a need for a policy of industrial groupings to promote "interunion understanding with the object of achieving eventual organic unity." This would have to be done according to a definite timetable. The working paper did not set a timetable.

The resolution passed with relative ease with the British Columbia delegates being the only group opposing the motion as a bloc. The BC delegates expressed great fears about dividing the labor movement, citing unions such as the Canadian Association of Industrial, Mechanical and Allied Workers as nationalist groups that were already "tearing at the flesh of the labor movement in this country".

The resolution is vague enough to allow the CUPE executive to accept any changes made at the CLC convention next May as satisfying CUPE's demands for reform, the condition on which CUPE's continued membership in the CLC "hinges".

A pull-out, which the executive could initiate is regarded as unlikely. CUPE, along with the CBRT and the PSAC seem more intent in establishing a stronger foothold in the CLC than in joining the Confederation of Canadian Unions (CCU) and building strong Canadian unions.

The leaders and policies of the CLC were strongly denounced by the whole convention during the debate for being against Canadian union and unconcerned with the plight of the union movement in general. The leaders of the CLC received criticism for bowing to the dictates of the international unions whose Canadian affiliates cannot set policy for the Canadian locals.

The working paper demand for new leadership will certainly be met as the head of the CLC is retiring. The "fight" to rid the congress of its present leadership is little more than an easy opportunity for the three unions to blow their own horn.

Stan Little, president of CUPE set the tone for the attack on the CLC with his cutting remarks about the American-dominated body:

"When we come to the CLC, we are faced with the problem that there is no effective centre for Canadian labor. In this case, the argument is that action must be taken to create something that does not now exist." We believe the congress leadership is blind to the social and political changes that have been occurring right in front of their noses over the past twenty years."

Addressing the CUPE convention Louis Laberge, president of the Quebec Federation of Labour (QFL) spoke strongly in support of the executive's stand towards the CLC, charging that the leadership of the congress had forgotten that they were elected to serve the wants of the members. But he pleaded with the CUPE convention not to get out of the CLC.

He also campaigned loudly for the CUPE executive who were re-elected for a sixth term. He felt that the expansionist policies the current executive wished to undertake deserved the full support of the rank and file.

Islanders wait for Metro to decide: Residential land or Disneyland?

By DICK BROWN

The countdown has begun, and by next week at this time, residents on Toronto Islands will know if they are to be evicted next year or if they will have their homes.

The full Metro council meets Tuesday in what promises to be a marathon session to decide the final fate of the last 254 homes on Wards and Algonquin Islands.

Reduced to its simplest terms, if Metro votes to evict the islanders, the residents will eventually be tossed out and their homes on the islands will be demolished for more parkland.

However, if Metro votes to turn the land over to the city of Toronto, a complex city proposal would preserve the homes and the community the islanders have created. The city proposal, contained in a massive document prepared by the city planning department, would essentially freeze the current community in its present form while the city and residents gather together a master plan by next August for the islands' residential section.

The broad outlines of the city's final proposal include preserving the existing housing stock, preventing speculators from making windfall profits, and adding some new housing on existing vacant lots.

The city turned over the 612-acre site of the entire Toronto Islands to Metro in 1956 with the understanding Metro would turn the area into a parkland.

Since then, Metro has systematically torn down the existing housing, starting at Hanlan's Point and working east to Wards and Algonquin, the last residential sections of the islands left.

During the almost 18 years since then, island residents have fought steadily to preserve their shrinking community.

The new city proposal dwells at great length on the need to preserve housing in an overcrowded metropolis and offers three sections of the islands it could take over.

The report finally selects an "intermediate area" consisting of all of Algonquin Island except the Queen City Yacht Club, and the section of Wards Island east of the acres of this area and the total unused area in the proposal would mean about 33.8 acres would be added, for a total of 62.8 acres of the 612 acre islands dedicated for the island community.

Not all of the land would be developed for housing, the report says, but some would be developed into public and community parkland.

The report also deals at length with many proposals to stop land speculators from moving in. Most of the proposals deal with some form of city control on land and housing transfers to new tenants or owners.

Currently the land is government owned, but the buildings are owned by the residents who in some cases sublet their homes to tenants.

The islands are essentially a middle and upper income enclave—46 per cent of the households have a yearly income of $9,000 or more.

Only 15 per cent of the households earn $5,000 per year or less, with 19 per cent earning between $5,000 and $9,000 per year.

Almost half—47 per cent—of the households are one- or two persons and 41 per cent are three or four person households.

The ages of islanders is about the same percentage breakdown as the rest of the city and Metro with only two significant differences:

Where 13.6 per cent in Metro and 20.3 per cent in the city are 55 years old or over on the islands only 10 per cent come from the older age group.

On the other hand while 28.8 per cent of the city residents and 23.4 per cent of the Metro residents are between 20 and 34-years-old, 34 per cent of the islanders fall in that age range.

The city study points to the severity of the winters on the islands (88 per cent of the dwellings are year-round houses) as discouraging older residents because of the ferry transportation to the mainland and walking required.

The city study says only six per cent of the residents are so-called "blue-collar" workers with 80 per cent of the residents being white collar or professional in occupation. The remaining 14 per cent the study classifies as "arts."

The study would also indicate the islands may not have a strong women's liberation contingent as 42 per cent of the women are listed as housewives (there were no male househusbands listed), and 73 per cent of the islands' full-time workforce is male with 27 per cent female.

Education of the island folk is high as 56 per cent of the non-student adults have at least some university,

Not too many old folks live on the islands because of the severe winters crossing the bay in a ferry boat.

32 per cent have Grade 12 or 13, and the remaining 10 per cent have some secondary school.

Island residents are not what could be considered transient, as 45 per cent have lived there for 11 or more years, and only 11 per cent have lived there two years or less. The remaining 44 per cent have lived there three to 10 years.

While some of the houses are rented out, 79 per cent of the dwellings are owner-occupied, two per cent of the houses have the owners living elsewhere on the islands and 19 per cent have absentee landlords living on the mainland.

Rents for the islanders are probably the best deal in town. Of 34 houses responding to the city survey, the average rent was $104.90 per month.

The 10 houses rented to the $12,000 per year and up bracket go for an average $107.50; the eight houses in the $9,000 to $12,000 bracket go for an average of $114.50; the 11 houses in the $5,000 to $9,000 bracket go for $109.40 average; the three houses in the $3,000 to $5,000 range go for $102.50; and the two houses in the $3,000 bracket go for $90 per month.

According to the city housing standards department the vast majority of the houses could be brought up to minimum standards for less than $5,000. Less than three per cent would cost $10,000 or more to bring up to standard.

In judo action last week-end Varsity judokas demonstrated much talent and depth. Novice Bill Bailey won four out of five bouts and a promotion to yellow. Andy Endo fought well against heavier opponents and was promoted to green. Ray Laurent also showed great promise.

Three female judokas on the team all received promotions. Fern Brand placed second and received a green belt while Ann-Marie Jannik and Lisa Zavarella both were promoted to orange.

In response to the female enthusiasm for the co-ed judo program at Hart House, a special program will begin January in the Benson Building.

The U of T wrestling club hosted Waterloo, Ryerson, and RMC here Saturday, with Waterloo (70½ points) capturing first place.

Ryerson gained second with 68½ points. In third was Toronto with 47½, while RMC finished last with 37½ points.

Toronto's next meet is against McMaster in Hamilton on Friday, December 7 at 7 p.m.

This had exploits of women

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Now it can be told — the latest results of women's interfac basketball. It only took Pots II several minutes to carve out a 2-0 victory over Vic II who did not show up for the game. In other default games, Meds I snuck by PHE III and Pots I by unknown scores.

Erindale, down 18-4 at one point, crept by SMC in the last minute 22-20. Erindale also gouged PHE VI in a double overtime (at time and a half).

We might also modestly note that PHE created a 16-14 defeat for the girls from Vic I to wear until further notice.

In what must have been an amazing tennis doubles tournament, Yurka and Loyes (Pots); Williams and Roberts (PHE); and Randall and Arthur (Pots) swept their quarterfinals — by default. However, in a strange volte-face, Brand and Harley (PHE) actually did play Beck and McCartney (Trin) and won! Zounds . . .

Strange and terrible rumours swept the Varsity office this morning that Hazel and Helen Lynn (Meds) won the Women's table tennis tournament last Thursday, beating 11 other teams into surly submission. O dear world, could civilization have sunk to this?

Volleyball lives!

Despite the cold climate of Laurentian, the senior women's team was too hot to handle on the volleyball court and overpowered the rest of the eastern section. This tournament consisted of only eastern section teams who played each other in a best two out of three match.

The early morning games served merely as warmups as Toronto laced Queen's in two straight games 15-4 and 15-6.

The second morning encounter matched the mighty Blues against a weak and depopulated Carleton squad. Toronto quickly put them out of their misery 15-0 and 15-1.

The host university, Laurentian, provided suitable fare for another massacre as Blues scalped 15-6 and 15-8 victories.

Ottawa, a semi-finalist in the earlier Challenge Cup, gave Toronto a good battle. The first game ended 15-9 for the Blues. In the second, a powerful Ottawa defence tired out the Blues who lost 15-13. However, Blues regained their form in the third game and forced the Ottawa mob to walk the plank 15-9.

The concluding match was against the Blues' nefarious local rivals, York. The Blues made peanut butter of York in the first game, sticking it to them 15-3. U of T then added the jelly in the second game, sandwiching those rural gamblers 15-3 to complete the round robin play.

Queen's crowned

Friday night saw the Women's ice hockey team defeat Queen's, the OWIAA defending champions, 5-2 at Kingston. The first period opened with uninspired play by both teams, but good backchecking and digging in the corners by Blue's Lorraine Sherman finally resulted in a goal by Margi Goldsmith.

From there on the teams settled down and played an exciting end to end game. The first period ended 3-1 in favour of the Blues on goals by Lynda Harley and Jan Mackay.

Play in the second period was on the rough side, but the Blues managed two more goals. Ange Colm knocked in a rebound shot off two posts by Allison McGeer and Lynda Harley scored again. The final score was Blues 5—Queen's 2.

SGS are b'ball Leviathans

SGS is proving to be the scourge of division IB basketball this year. On Monday, undefeated SGS raced to its fifth victory in a row, clobbering Scarborough 103-62. Leading scorers for SGS were Field (27 points), Svacek (19), Amos (13), and Johnson (12). The Slacks—Bob (19), and Rob (14)—were Scar's pointmen.

In what was supposed to be the feature game of last week, the remaining unbeaten teams, SMC A and Vic, met to determine who was number one in Division 1A. St. Mike's parlayed 26 points by Trafford and a sticky defense to win 76-62. For Vic, Kastelec dumped in 14 points while Eben dowaddied for 13.

Finally Meds are beginning to live up to their pre-season notices. They dumped hard-luck PHE 65-52, even though PHE led at one point 15-0. Sherkin (15), Sternberg (12), and Seppala (11) led Meds while Billingham (12) was PHE's top pointman.

Fencers slash rivals

The men's fencing team entered the Queen's - RMC invitational tournament in Kingston last weekend and placed first, even though handicapped by not having a ladies' foil team.

Weakened by graduation and retirement, this year's team relied greatly on its many rookies, many of whom had no previous tournament experience.

In sabre, veteran Andy Benyei led rookies Robert Vigod and Tom Ladanyi to first place in a field of seven.

In epee, the team of Wing Nip, Abu Nazir and Peter Hlavats were narrowly defeated by a well-conditioned RMC team for first place.

In foil, Bernard Tsui, Rod Toms and Bob O'Hasty placed fourth in a field of thirteen.

FINALLY, a story which literally swoops from the sky and captures the imagination... Balzac is an engaging bird and the author also pays special attention to his relationship with Beatrice, his free-flying companion, who is as independent and interesting as the main character. Publishers should heed this new wave in literature and encourage writers to follow Guaneau's inspired lead.

JUST IN TIME for Christmas. This will be a delightful addition to the collection of presents under the family tree. The inspiring story of a courageous pelican is a welcome change from the gratuitous sex and violence so often found in literature today. We can only hope that it will soon be translated for the screen.

Wings of Freedom receives CRITICAL ACCLAIM!

A WHOLESOME FABLE of life in a technological age...stunning imagery... "Old Longbill"—Balzac's godfather and spiritual mentor—is as engaging a character as any I've run across in a long time... wholeheartedly recommended for freedom-lovers from nine to ninety.

A FIRST in existentialist literature. Balzac, a pelican on the verge of breakdown because of the anomie produced by his confining avian milieu, resolves his contradictions and proves for us all that, indeed, "praxis makes perfect". Being, en vrai, has transcended thought. Simone and I recommend it highly.

EIGHT AND ONE HALF INCHES wide by eleven inches tall, Wings of Freedom has a rest mass of more than one hundred and twenty four grams. While spectroscopic and other analyses of the book are in progress, and no firm data have yet been obtained on many of its characteristics, it seems probable that its careful design—it is rectangularly prismatic in form—should render it structurally stable and capable of withstanding heavy commercial and domestic use. Commendably free of gratuitous sexist content.

A message from the publisher

Once in a very long while, a book publisher encounters a work indelibly stamped with greatness, a work at once identifiable as having an import beyond mere timeliness and surface impact, a work which is, as Chopsky so graphically put it, "fairly reeking of immortality". It is these rare moments which make a publisher's life worthwhile.

When Jean-Luc Guaneau first walked into my Manhattan offices in the late summer of 1971, I was immediately struck by a sensation, a feeling—call it what you will—that I was in the presence of a personality powerful beyond the measure of ordinary humanity. Through the mild tones of his cultured, intensely fascinating conversation, I could detect an undercurrent of unextinguishable vitality, the unquenchable flame of a mind untrammelled by the blinkers of the commonplace.

The enthusiastic critical and public reception to his first novel more than confirmed my intuition; however, I firmly believe that it is for Wings of Freedom that history will remember him. Taking the unlikely figure of a pelican, Balzac, for his protagonist, Guaneau has woven an intricate and moving tale of a being in search of the meaning of its own existence, a meaning above and beyond "the buffeting of vagrant winds, the endless migrations, and the lust, the unconquerable need for raw, clammy fish..."

Pseudo-intellectual, life-negating critics, dangling like small spiders from slender cynical threads, may scoff, even sneer, at this simple, and evocative tale. But for you and I, the "plain folks" who are the very stuff and fabric of our great culture, Wings of Freedom and its sensitive, bird's-eye view of Contemporary Society, will be like a breath of fresh air in the thickening smog of destructive criticism and left-wing pessimism and paranoia with which we are increasingly bombarded.

Wings of Freedom: a flying start on tomorrow.

Library workers settle contract

By MARINA STRAUSS

The library workers' union ratified a new contract Wednesday by a substantial majority of 223-67, with three abstentions.

However, the contract does not meet all the demands the union, Local 1230 of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), was after.

"It's not what we wanted," admitted union executive committee president Tom Bribiesco.

The contract allows for a five per cent salary increase in the first year, retroactive to July 1, 1973, and a seven and a half per cent increase in the second year, beginning July 1, 1974.

The bottom wage scales will receive an increase of 11 per cent in the first year due to changes in increments between different wage scales.

Under the former contract, starting salary for library workers in the lowest scale was $4,664 per year. Under the new contract, the starting salary will be $5,182 effective January 1, as of July 1, 1974, $5,571.

"This is the closest we got to our wage demands," Bribiesco said. The union had demanded a 15 per cent wage increase each year.

Due to its position on the classification scales, a group of 61 employees at the top of the classification scales will receive an extra lump sum of $250 instead of a raise in salary.

Another group of employees who did not receive increments in July will get settlement pay for varying amounts.

One battle the union did win over management was the demand for a comprehensive health plan.

A new sick-leave plan, which is effective for all university employees, will allow an employee to receive pay for up to 15 weeks in case of illness or accident. The plan is renewable.

In the past, each employee was entitled to one and a quarter days sick leave each month or 15 days each year.

"If you hadn't saved up time, you received no pay for the first three and a half months of an illness," explained executive committee chief steward Judy Darcy. "The only recourse for such an employee was to collect unemployment insurance."

The sick-leave plan also covers leave of absence during pregnancy, previously uncovered.

One of the key demands of the union that management did not meet was a cost of living formula escalator clause.

Another defeat the union suffered was management's refusal to decrease the number of hours per week to 15 from 24 as the requirement for part-time workers to join the union.

"There are over 200 part-time workers at the library, and none are union members," Bribiesco said. "If we ever went on strike, they would be used as scabs."

Classifications, "promotions, and the filling of vacancies become grievable under the new contract."

"Before, an employee could merely request an upgrading of his or her position," Bribiesco explained. "Now we can go through the grievance procedure, and through arbitration."

Although not in the contract, the university administration has allowed employees three days off during the Christmas holiday period, in addition to statutory holidays.

"There are a lot of things left out of the contract, such as working conditions at the Robarts Library," Darcy claimed.

"The staff at the Robarts are a lot more dissatisfied with the conditions there than it ever was at the Sigmond Samuel Library," she added.

"The negotiating committee felt the contract was the best it could get through bargaining negotiations," Darcy asserted. "If there were a chance for getting more, strike action would have been necessary."

The union has decided not to strike without at least two-thirds majority in favor of strike action. "Otherwise strike action would be ineffective, since about 40 per cent of library employees are non-unionized," Bribiesco said. Part-time staff and librarians below supervisory status may not join the union.

The union will be working towards improving working conditions at the Robarts, such as the lighting and air conditioning systems, and facilities for employees.

He added 80 per cent of the membership voted at Wednesday's contract meeting, and that "a greater number of people than ever before voted to reject the contract proposals."

SAC lashes back at admin

By BOB BETTSON

Graduate Students Union President Cliff Watson and SAC president Bob Anderson have countered accusation of misrepresentation levelled at the SAC and GSU campaigns for the rejection of the administration's new code of behavior.

In a strongly-worded reply to accusations of five key members of the administration and the faculty, Anderson and Watson charge a SAC-GSU leaflet is basically correct and the administration is misrepresenting the SAC campaign.

They call administration charges "an attempt to obscure the true nature of the discipline code and discredit the opposition to it."

In a 14-point reply to each of the charges, Anderson and Watson condemn the statement saying there was ample opportunity for student input into the code, charging the code "underwent a complete revision in April" and it was adopted despite protests by student organizations urging delay until the fall.

The reply also refutes charges made by academic affairs chairman John Dove, internal affairs chairwoman Marnie Paikin and Professor R.M.H. Shepherd, J.B. Dunlop and law professor John Swan that the discipline proposals "are as just and undiscriminatory as possible towards all members of the university community."

Anderson and Watson argue the SAC statement which says "students have no power to determine offenses or shape the conditions that give rise to disciplinary problems", is basically correct.

The letter called the statement a "gross distortion of truth."

The reply says "how can the authors claim that students have any significant power in determining which acts are considered offenses when the three major student organizations and all eight student governors are in opposition to the code?"

They also say the authors reveal the basic purpose of the code when they call the 1971 disruptions of the faculty council of arts and science "the most serious disciplinary problems in recent years."

"This makes it clear the primary purpose of the code is to prevent legitimate student protest."

In a related move, the SAC executive decided Wednesday to mail out a petition calling for the rejection of the Conway-Cadario code of behavior along with an explanation of SAC's position rejecting the code but supporting an alternative using the basic principles of the Campbell report.

The executive reaffirmed their unconditional opposition to the present discipline code and voted money to finance a joint campaign with the steering committee, a coalition of students opposed to the code.

SAC president Bob Anderson said yesterday the executive had offered the groups opposing the implementation of any discipline code an opportunity to explain their position, but they "couldn't agree to a unified statement."

Anderson said there was still a basis of agreement with the steering committee despite the unhappiness of some of its members with the SAC position.

"We have the responsibility to inform the students about our position and alternative to the code," he added.

SAC is also sending out a line-by-line analysis of the code specifically explaining its reasons for rejection.

In reply to the proponents of the "no code" position Anderson said it is important to have a disciplinary structure to protect students from arbitrary decisions in the case of academic offenses.

He added it is "important to work toward something like the Campbell report "which supports student representation" on decision-making bodies and operational agreement between students and faculty in the classroom as a prerequisite to any disciplinary procedures.

The official SAC position rejects the code as "repressive," criticizing it for being arbitrary and vague. It demands in the case of a disruption "any disciplinary procedures must acknowledge the necessity of dealing with mass action through negotiation over substantive issues involved."

Governing Council members will be busy over the holidays as students while away their time with chestnuts over open fires.

Nine committee meetings and a full Governing Council meeting are packed into the next two weeks, so students needing a place to sleep should stop by Simcoe Hall and take in the inaction.

The best show should be the December 20 Governing Council meeting where governors, exhausted after nine committee meetings, are scheduled to make the final decision on whether to phase out the Faculty of Food Science.

Food Science dean Ira Armstrong and a number of the faculty's supporters have launched a firm counter-attack to the move from Simcoe Hall to dissolve their faculty.

However, two of council's committees, planning and resources and academic affairs, have voted overwhelmingly in favor of what they term is an "integration into a new department of nutrition and food science."

The discipline code is not scheduled to come up at this meeting, as chairman Malim Harding gave his "personal assurance" during November's Governing Council meeting the code's implementation would not be decided while students are off campus.

It is still worth watching, however, to see if there are any eleventh-hour moves to outflank that promise.

Faculty Association president Bill Nelson has sent a scathing letter to council criticising council for stalling during the November meeting in the face of strong student opposition to the code's implementation.

Last June, the code was passed in principle by Governing Council after students had left the campus. There is no indication whether this may occur during Christmas again.

Governing Council will likely give a quiet nod of approval to this week's decision by internal affairs committee to build the new athletic fieldhouse, and possibly a swimming pool, on the parking lot next to the Benson Building rather than rip down homes on the northeast corner of Spadina and Harbord Streets.

Turning to the committees, academic affairs will again be plowing through the Forster report on hiring and firing policy on December 18.

So far, the committee has discarded the Forster document itself as too poorly written to be of much use and instead is using a revised version of university president John Evans' summary of the report's recommendations.

This is likely to be a sleepy-heads meeting as the committee has no chance of reaching the recommendation urging no student participation in hiring, firing and tenure committees nor the recommendation urging a contingency plan to fire tenured staff for financial reasons.

The December 17 meeting of internal affairs committee looks like it may well set the university parking policy on a status quo basis with a recommendation for further research and parking structures.

That would likely bring some sharp comment from Toronto Alderman Colin Vaughan who has already urged the university to take a leadership role and cutback on parking as an example for others in the down town core to follow in discouraging the use of cars in the downtown city during the energy crisis.

Other committee meetings will do more to cure student insomnia than anything else. The executive committee meeting December 11 will review decisions made by the other Governing Council committees. Then the executive committee will pass on recommendations for the full council to review.

One committee meeting, the research policy subcommittee, holds a flicker of hope for interesting discussion as the December 10 gathering is to take a look at current research policy.

Trinity uses moderate discipline code

By BOB BETTSON

While most of the university grapples with the new discipline code, at least one college is operating along the lines of the more moderate 1969 Campbell report on discipline.

Surprisingly enough, the moderation is found at Trinity College, often thought of as the home of conservatism on campus.

But it's not a surprise to Head of Arts and fourth year Classics student John Wilson, who now sits on a Trinity staff-student committee considering the new code.

Wilson thinks the Trinity system "differs very much (from the Conway-Cadario code) in the attitude of trust and tolerance."

Students handle all disciplinary complaints of a non-academic nature themselves with separate committees for male and female students at Trinity and St. Hilda's respectively.

Wilson added that a general meeting of students makes the non-academic rules.

In practice, the Trinity system rests on mediation and not formal disciplinary procedures. Wilson said there has never been a need to invoke the college tribunal which deals with academic charges against students and staff. The tribunals are not used if the problem is not resolved by the parties concerned.

Complaints by students against faculty members are dealt with first through a confidential complaint to the head of the department.

Wilson said the Trinity committee examining the code is trying to find out "where we stand with the university. We are not sure it won't affect the federated colleges."

"Our own system works fine," he said. "It radiates trust." The Trinity student executive has opposed the university's proposed code of behavior.

Another difference in the Trinity discipline system, based on the Campbell report, is in dealing with demonstrations. Wilson said in the Trinity system "it is more important to deal with the substantive issues raised by a demonstration than to end it."

He added attempts to end a demonstration would only be made if it endangered "persons or property."

and "only after widespread consultation between students, faculty and administration."

On the question of double jurisdiction, the Trinity procedures specifically reject using college disciplinary procedures if the student is charged through the courts. This could only happen in extreme circumstances.

Wilson believes discipline should generally not interfere in people's private lives and feels "discipline must grow out of the community rather than be imposed upon it."

Questionnaire freaks get choice in poli ec

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Are you tired of that same old political economy course evaluation questionnaire?

Cheer up, friend, because this year you and 5,000 other students taking political economy courses will have two different questionnaires to choose from.

One of them comes from the political economy faculty who are using the same form as was distributed last year.

The other questionnaire is being given out by the Political Economy Course Union (PECU).

After talks between the faculty and PECU stalemated over the type of questions to be used in this year's course evaluation, each side had decided independently, and apparently without the other side's knowledge, to distribute its own evaluation form.

Howard Stein, chairman of PECU, explained why last year's questionnaire, written by both faculty and students, was no longer acceptable.

"It had a lot of closed questions on it like 'How do you rate this professor: good, fair or poor?' Now what does that mean? It looks objective but it's really just subjective feeling."

Stein said this year's PECU form asked "open-ended" questions on different areas such as "does this professor have bias?"

In the last section of the PECU questionnaire, Stein said, students are asked important questions that were not on last year's form.

These include questions on parity, hiring and firing, and student representation on the search committee for a new chairman of the political economy department.

Stein complained that the department had not told PECU that it was going to distribute a questionnaire.

"They even had the audacity to put 'Course Union' on the cover," he exclaimed.

The chairman of the political economy department, J. Stephan Dupre, was in Ottawa and unavailable for comment but the secretary for undergraduate affairs, Peter Silcox, explained the faculty's side of the story.

"We're quite surprised," said Silcox. "It was really up to them. They could have come to the department but we got no indication at all what they were going to do. There's been no lack of communication on our side."

Chairman Dupre, Silcox continued, thought the yearly evaluation was very important. "The chairman has been much keener than I personally am. He puts considerable store in them," said Silcox.

Dupre also thought it was necessary not to change the questions year after year, said Silcox. This allowed comparisons to be made and improvements to be noted.

These reasons led Dupre to have last year's questionnaire distributed to students.

Silcox did not think questions on "general policy" such as parity, and student representation on search committees should be asked on a questionnaire about courses. He thought this should be done separately.

As to leaving "Course Union" on the cover of the faculty questionnaire, Silcox said this was inadvertently done but conceded it was "a mistake."

However, Silcox said, as soon as Stein complained, "we crossed it off the cover. Anyway, it was quite clear if you read the blurb inside."

Both sides will now evaluate and publish their findings. Barring any future reconciliation between PECU and the faculty, it looks like there will also be two different questionnaires for the spring courses.

Geog students can't decide

A meeting of 50 geography students Wednesday failed to reach any conclusions on what should happen to a departmental proposal to leave the specialist program intact.

The department agreed last Friday to postpone any decision on the future of the specialist program until after students had met this week.

The Friday meeting was the first attended by members of the Toronto University Geographical Society (TUGS) since last year. They had voted to boycott the departmental council because of "the lack of a student voice in running the department..." and reservations concerning Dr. Jacob Spelt as chairman of the department.

Wednesday's student meeting heard complaints particularly about the statistics course requirement and the four year thesis requirement.

But opinion was by no means unified. TUGS president Charles Morrison said he was basically happy with the specialist requirements.

Many other students disagreed. Finally at the end of the two hour meeting only two students voted in favor of the departmental specialist proposal. Nine voted for a compromise and sixteen voted for a specialist program that would include any ten courses with a statistics requirement. There were a large number of abstentions.

Morrison told The Varsity this could not be considered representative of all the students in the department, but admitted it was a clear reflection of discontent.

TUGS is planning to hold another meeting in January to continue discussion and hold elections for the new executive for 1974.

The department has agreed to put off a decision on the specialist requirement for future years although Morrison said the present one will remain in tact for next year.

Executive member Inga Rinne said making an interim change and then changing it again next year would be unfair to the students.

Now who's worried about free speech?

Black clouds are hanging over the worried of both administration and faculty after discovering that students were less prone to lying down and accepting the discipline code than they had thought.

After all, it was passed this summer and they didn't hear a word out of those little undergrads at that time. So when students got angry a couple of weeks ago and made it known that they were opposed to the discipline code, the faculty and administration not only got a trifle worried, but also started mumbling things about "freedom of debate", that is freedom from "student threats." This of course has little to do with the potential abrogation of student's freedom of debate posed by the discipline code.

A letter from Marnie Palkin's Flying Circus last week charged that SAC was creating a "systematic campaign of innuendo and misrepresentation" against the discipline code. Marnie's internal affairs committee is the body most responsible for the code, and the unhappiest body to see it run up against all that flak from the students. The letter states that the student protest is due for the most part to the SAC campaign to oppose the code. Do tell, Marnie.

But if it weren't for SAC, and we don't quite feel that their tactics are all that brave, things might be a little tougher for students later on in university history. It doesn't take that much before something as vague as the discipline code becomes almost biblical in its ability to be used and/or misrepresented.

Closely following that letter was another from the U of T Faculty Association complaining about how the toothless Governing Council was backing down from students after facing "disruption or threats of disruption." The letter implicitly states that the Governing Council should get tough with these nasty student radicals, and stop allowing them to bring their uncultivated grievances before the nice clean council, who after all, are the only "legitimate" decision-making body for the whole campus.

The disruptions, according to the letter, which was signed by association president Bill Nelson, a conservative to say the least, constitute a threat to free speech on the campus.

There's not much we can say to that, except that the council seems more worried about their freedom of speech when it comes to ramming the discipline code through, than the freedom of speech that we feel is also the student's right, and one that will be potentially curtailed if the code is passed.

Thanks for worrying about freedom of speech on the campus, Bill, but we'd rather act now before it disappears.

No humor in Nelles House water prank

A disgusting display of poor taste was presented this week by the (thankfully) unnamed residents of the Nelles House men's residence at Vic.

Their idea of Yuletide joy consisted of pouring a few buckets of water on a young Indian man from northern Ontario as he walked between the residence and the library.

Apparently they thought it great laughs to soak the man, who having had a fair amount to drink chose to relieve himself next to the residence.

What they didn't know is the man had travelled south to seek a job to escape the futility of life on a reserve, a reserve created by the white man.

For his efforts, a group of white men abuse him, thinking a "drunk Indian" is a laughing matter. A native person trying to find a job in a white man's city of discrimination is enough to drive anybody to drink, so why the jollies?

The same mentality which finds fun in the problems of a minority race is the same white man's mentality which creates Indian reserves to put them "out of sight and out of mind" after the white man has driven them off of their birthright.

We know of only one word to describe this sort of behavior. It's a word which gets tossed around a lot on this campus, sometimes correctly sometimes incorrectly. In the case of the unnamed Nelles residents, it's correct. Racism.

Task force suggestions reasonable

The report of the Task Force to Review Policies and Procedures on Academic Appointments has come under substantial criticism of late. It has been contended that the report dismisses considerations of teaching ability in tenure evaluation, and that the way to rectify this inadequacy is to institute student parity on tenure committees. In response to the parity proposal, I intend to show that the Task Force has suggested reasonable methods for evaluating teaching ability, which if adopted, would lead to a simple, reliable method for granting tenure while giving sufficient weight to teaching ability.

Task force suggestions

We begin by recommending as strongly as we can that each division, department and teaching unit take seriously the problem of assessing teaching ability in the discipline concerned. (Task Force Report, page 34)

Included among several specific suggestions for teaching assessment is the following:

Most members of the Task Force would encourage divisions and departments to encourage the development of the student committee in each division and department which would be a stable and continuing organization capable of responsibly providing such teaching assessments on a regular basis for all faculty members. (Task Force Report, page 35)

Although some committees for evaluation of teaching ability do exist, such as MPSCU, their reports do not carry sufficient credentials to be taken seriously in tenure evaluations. The amount of data collected is erratic; the amount of time given to students to fill out questionnaires is often insufficient, making it dubious whether much thought has been given in filling them out; an edited collection of subjective comments by students is rarely provided; and, university or even department policy on what constitutes good teaching style has never been affirmed, making a uniform evaluation procedure which would be acceptable to a tenure committee difficult to implement. Also such assessments are not usually done within the departments, so that special considerations such as the nature of the course material or availability of good text-books are generally not available to the assessors.

To include teaching ability in tenure evaluations, one must be able to evaluate teaching ability effectively. Ongoing assessment committees, run by undergraduate and graduate students within each department, could successfully manage such evaluations.

On parity

The Task Force report considered the possibility of seating students on tenure committees.

We (the Task Force) have been unable, however, to agree that there should be student members on such (tenure) committees. We have agreed that effectiveness in teaching must be an important factor in the decision to award a tenured appointment and, subsequently, in promotions (sic) decisions. We have agreed that procedures for the assessment of effective teaching must be improved in many divisions of the University, and later, in this report, we have suggested methods by which this goal might be accomplished. We believe that individual students, both undergraduate and graduate, should have an opportunity to make their views known to the tenure committee. And finally, we do not accept some of the common arguments against student membership on such committees. Most of us do not believe that students cannot or will not respect the confidential nature of such a committee's proceedings or that their presence would somehow inhibit discussion of a candidate's qualifications. (Task Force Report, page 27) However, the task force felt that problems associated with student membership were difficult to reconcile. For example,

• Although "most members of the Task Force have known students, both graduate and undergraduate, whose intellectual capacity and judgment are such that one could easily accept their presence on a tenure committee," they felt that "a major obstacle was the problem of how to select students of this calibre." (Task Force Report, pages 27-28)

• How should conflicts of interest be handled? What happens when a tenure committee member is in the midst of taking a course from one of the candidates? What if a graduate student committee member is voting on tenure for his thesis supervisor? (Task Force Report, paraphrased from page 28)

The seating of students on tenure committees will not solve the problem of evaluation of teaching ability. At best it will ensure that teaching ability is given proper weight in making tenure decisions. However, there are other methods of gaining such assurance without the problems attendant in the selection of student members.

Some members of the Task Force have argued that one function that might be served by either a student, alumni (sic) or a member of the public at large would be to ensure that justice may be seen to be done, that the evidence concerning a candidate was complete and placed before the committee and that the committee did duly weigh all elements of the evidence. . . (Task Force Report, page 29)

Adoption of this proposal would ensure teaching ability was given adequate weight, and if it were not, then formal grounds for appeal would be available.

Proposal for teaching assessment in tenure evaluation

The following is an outline for a proposal on how to modify current tenure evaluation procedures so that teaching assessment is given sufficient weight.

1. Each department should create a student committee to evaluate teaching ability. The committee should have formal methods of soliciting data and a standard method for editing the data into a final report. Although the data would remain confidential, the report would be made available to students and faculty within the department. The tenure committee could solicit the original data to determine whether the edited report was a fair summary of student evaluations.

2. Candidates for tenure would be permitted to view the material contained in their portfolios. This would enable them to decide whether various aspects of their case were well enough documented and to reply to any special assessments (about teaching ability, recent research, etc.).

3. A selection procedure should be developed for the appointment of a student who would observe tenure committee meetings to ensure that justice is served.

This proposal still leaves questions unanswered. How to select a student observer and on what criteria teaching should be assessed are not formalized. However, it does serve to quell some to the debate on parity without sacrificing the goals that parity seeks to establish.

The above comments are the product of a special subcommittee on tenure of the department council of the Department of Computer Science. Proposal (1) is currently under consideration by the department, for use in tenure decisions as well as salary raise evaluations and assignment of courses to faculty. Proposal (2) has been accepted practice in our department for some years. A similar proposal has recently been suggested in the Mathematics department. Proposal (3) could not be adopted by any department unless ruled on by the university at large.

It is possible that the above proposals will prove to be inadequate. If this turns out to be the case, then at least we will have substantive data on the efficacy of student participation in tenure decision-making before adopting more radical proposals, such as parity.

Peace talks must involve Palestinians

The ceasefire that was, appropriately enough, signed on Armistice day between Israel and Egypt, superficially represents a great step towards peace in the Middle East. In fact however, it will probably prove to be a re-run of the same events which took place in 1948-9, 1956, 1967, and 1970 with the Rogers Peace Plan, namely the collapse of the ceasefire agreements etc. which had been set up with such great difficulty by the UN or the great powers.

The refusal of the Israelis to recognise the Palestinian Arabs as an independent factor in their own right automatically dooms the present arrangements to the role of being a temporary bandage that will last only until the next opportunity for war. The Arab states' reluctance to consider seriously the formation of a Palestinian state in the past, the civil war in Jordan in 1970, and the intrigues between Palestinian guerrillas and Arab governments means that many Palestinians are afraid that once again peace discussions are not going to consider their rights seriously except in a hasty and superficial way. Some Palestinian leaders have expressed fears on a number of occasions since 1948 that if and when eventually the Arab states settle their territorial and ideological disputes with Israel, the refugees will once again be left out in the cold. Hence the existence of guerrilla movements which exist not so much to terrorize the Jewish people throughout the world, as to keep their cause in everyone's mind and to remind the world of their desperation.

How are the Palestinians to focus attention on their case other than by resorting to drastic acts which constantly put them into the limelight? They are not a constituted government so it is difficult for them to present their case; they are dependant upon the charity of Arab government to help them in this, but this has depended on whether publicity of the Arab Palestinians' cause is politically convenient at the time.

This is why the ceasefire will fail from the start unless adequate measures are taken at once by all parties to ensure that the Palestinians are represented, not by being observers affiliated to either the Jordanian or Egyptian delegations as has been the case in the past, but as a body equal in status to each of the parties' governments.

Unfortunately one can not be optimistic. No party wants the ceasefire and each wishes to continue the war but is prevented by their respective big power friends who use their position as the arms' suppliers to force their own 'peace' policies on the peoples of the Middle East.

Any working arrangement must be accomplished by the local belligerents themselves without the adoption of facile solutions proposed by foreigners who do not have to live with the consequences of their own actions and decisions.

A step in the right direction would be for an arms embargo on the area, but of course this does not solve the position of the Palestinian resistance who have underground sources of arms supplies. They would not have any difficulty in keeping themselves supplied with arms despite an embargo on the Middle East. This emphasizes the need for the Palestinians to approve of any 'final' settlement.

Any solution would have to include the restoration of all occupied territory to those countries which lost them in 1967, followed immediately by the formation of an independent Palestinian state on the west bank of the Jordan, and on the Gaza strip. Refugees have to be allowed to return, or compensated to everyone's satisfaction; and last but not least, all forms of discrimination and race laws existing in Israel at the present time would have to be removed.

I am not optimistic that the present arrangements will be successful. Already it has gotten off to a bad start for the agreement was made only between the governments of Egypt and Israel. I am afraid that unless the Palestinians are made a part of projected peace talks, they will react with the only means available to them which could involve a world-wide guerrilla campaign with no holds barred, and a resulting Israeli counter-offensive the world over, as was the case before the latest war, when agents of both sides indulged in an assassination spree which caused the loss of life of a number of innocent Europeans in the crossfire.

The Israelis for themselves, make no bones about how they are not really a voluntary signatory of the ceasefire agreements, pointing out that pressure on the part of the US forced them to sign. They might decide in the face of 'ostensible (not to mention convenient) provocation' on the part of Egypt, to re-open hostilities. In any event, celebration of the ceasefire must be sobered when one realizes the extent of work that lies ahead.

First-ever Varg understatement

Congratulations on the first instance of a Varsity understatement. In your article on Imperial Optical (December 3) you note that one of Imperial's subsidiaries, Braddock Optical, has 12 outlets in Toronto. In the same issue, in a paid advertisement, Braddock proudly claims 13 outlets "throughout Metro". What is this—a cover up?

Kenneth McNaught

(Ed. Professor McNaught is wrong. The Varsity's first example of understatement occurred in this year's November 16 issue. In the 'lead' in the story "Code rejected: student demo next week" we claimed that "more than 116 students attended a mass meeting..." Unfortunately, as we have realized, there were over 150 students at the "mass meeting". Our credibility gap is rapidly being undermined.)

Need users' fees for some sports

In its current report the task force on athletics recommends the very sensible policy that in the allocation of scarce resources priority should be given to multi-purpose facilities. Unfortunately this policy is bound to give low priority to such sports as squash and winter tennis, which are becoming increasingly popular but require expensive one-purpose facilities. Thus the task force scaled down the plan of an earlier report for 30 squash courts to a much more modest proposal for eight courts. But the task force did not consider whether squash and tennis are not suitable candidates for a method of "pay as you play" financing, under which the university would seek to recover through subscription and/or users' fees at least the balance of the cost (both capital and operating) by which playing squash or tennis exceeds say, running around the Hart House track. Such a method has much to recommend it on the grounds of justice and responsiveness to demand; it also appears that by means of it the university could offer to its members ample playing facilities that are very reasonably priced and far below the cost of playing either squash or tennis in any of the commercial courts that are now mushrooming in the city.

My own game is tennis, the more expensive of the two, I suspect, and certainly much too expensive for me to pursue during the winter in any city club. Some very rough figuring suggests to me that bubbles installed over existing tennis courts in the university would cost between $2.50 and $3.50 per court hour on the assumption that the courts would be fully utilized on an 80 hour week for a season of 30 weeks. Is there not a strong case to be made for forming a university tennis club to which the university would lease a specified number of playing hours in a winter facility that it would also use for instructional and intercollegiate purposes? Since a three-court facility would be used to capacity by as few as 160 players playing an average of three hours per week (singles), it is difficult to see how the university would have much trouble in leasing whatever number of playing hours it wishes to make available at a rate of between $2.50 and $3.50 per court hour to be divided among the players and to be raised through a combination of subscription and booking fees.

I suspect that the economics of squash would make an even more compelling case for users' fees, and I also suspect that the number of players willing to pay reasonable fees for well-run squash facilities is very large. But I am more concerned with tennis in this letter, not only because it is the game that I happen to play myself, but also because at the moment the tennis courts owned by the university and the federated colleges are among the most useless athletic facilities on campus. In a good year, members of the university community have a chance to play on them for a few weeks at the beginning and end of the academic year, during the winter they lie fallow, and during the summer many of them are leased to outside clubs with nominal university connections. Users' fees that are sufficiently low to attract a sizable number of people would in all probability suffice to convert these courts to all-year facilities at very little cost to the university's general athletic budget.

Vietnamese will ultimately win

Through a long and difficult struggle the Vietnamese will ultimately achieve their goal of political independence from US power and the elimination of Washington's Saigon puppet. Since last January the Provisional Revolutionary Government has greatly extended its political administration and influence in the South. Whereas, and because of the fact that as a result of the long years of war much of the traditional class structure of South Vietnam has broken down, the Thieu regime is increasingly only able to control the populace outside of its urban enclaves by using its military and police forces in a demonstration of its willingness to murder and terrorize in order to preserve itself. A capability which of course is still being entirely paid for and instructed in its every detail by the Nixon administration.

While the PRG controls some of the potentially most productive agricultural, rich plantation and mineral-laden areas of South Vietnam, vast capital outlays and a good deal of time will be required for successful reconstruction efforts in these areas. Millions of bomb craters and the destruction of the irrigation systems have resulted in the seepage of salt water into these lands, the effects of which will have to be remedied before the land can again begin to provide the staples of life and the means of livelihood for its inhabitants. Also, funds for medical equipment, some of which can be purchased only in the West with hard currencies, and every imaginable material human necessity are desperately needed by the Vietnamese living in the PRG zones to protect themselves against constant US-Saigon encroachment, and generally to provide for the security and continued competitive viability of the resistance struggle.

Barring Americans isn't racism

There was a letter in the November 12 Varsity from a Howard R. Woodhouse, complaining that he wasn't allowed to run for a position on the Governing Council the university of Toronto's "highest" decision-making body, because he is not a Canadian citizen. The 85 per cent Canadian Quota Campaign not only supports the rule restricting seats on the Governing Council to Canadian citizens, but it further demands that 85 per cent of all full-time professors be Canadian citizens; that no more than one-quarter of the remaining 15 per cent be of any one other foreign citizenship, and that all department chairmen and higher be Canadian citizens. Mr. Woodhouse's letter only confirms the correctness of our demands.

Mr. Woodhouse did not come out clearly and state whether or not he is a US citizen, but the material in his letter is so US-oriented and so slavish to the Students for a Democratic Society (Canada Ltd.) and its US-based political demands that we would be willing to bet that he is a Yankee.

In referring to the citizenship rule, Mr. Woodhouse says: "This arbitrary rule, enacted by the Ontario legislature, is racist because it discriminates against a section of the university community on the basis of the racial background, or rather because they do not belong to the race or nation known as Canada." I would like to inform Mr. Woodhouse that there is no such thing as the race of Canada. If he thinks that Canadians are a race, then we do not want him fighting racist ideology in Canada, because he doesn't have the slightest idea what race is. What is worse, he doesn't even know what Canada is.

Does Mr. Woodhouse consider himself to be a part of the nation of Canada?

Mr. Woodhouse goes on to state about the restriction: "Brought in at a time when there was a lot of talk about the need to limit the numbers of American professors, it was no doubt considered progressive, but were it designed to limit the numbers of Jewish professors on Council, one would not hesitate to call it anti-Semitic." This in itself is entirely correct, but the implication that the citizenship requirement is related to anti-Semitism is an absolute red herring and fraud, and again shows Mr. Woodhouse's complete lack of understanding of what he is talking about.

Citizenship can be taken out by anybody, regardless of race, creed, colour, nationality, age, sex, marital status, ancestry, or place of origin. It is a political standing within a community, and those who choose to become Canadian citizens make a conscious commitment to this country. Mr. Woodhouse also fails to understand this when he states: "What bearing such an act (becoming a Canadian citizen) would have upon my ability to serve on Council remains a mystery."

One thing is not a mystery. If Mr. Woodhouse is not a Canadian citizen, he is a citizen of some other country — probably the US. Is he too proud of being an American to revoke his citizenship?

Mr. Woodhouse would like to fight racism at the U of T. He uses as his source material against racism all kinds of examples written in and about the US! Almost one-third of his letter deals with studies of blacks in the US. Thus we find difficulty applying them to Canada.

In the first place, the main problem in this country is not racism, but US imperialism — US control of our industry, unions, natural resources, and our universities. Less than half the teachers in English language, post-secondary educational institutions in Canada are Canadian citizens. In the second place, racism in Canada takes a completely different form from the racism of the United States. Studies of US black ghettos no doubt have some relevance to Canadians, but Mr. Woodhouse seems in his letter to be completely ignorant of the situation of the black Canadian. We recommend that he read a book by a black Canadian, soon to be published by New Canada Press under the title Black Canadians - A Long Line of Fighters. The author is Headley Tulloch.

As far as SDS is concerned, their avowed priorities are to fight racism, imperialism, and the oppression of women. The problem with these priorities is that racism is a by-product of imperialism and so the struggle against racism is secondary to and part of the struggle against imperialism. Racism has always been at its most blatant and oppressive stage at the height of the various empires — Greece, Rome, Spain, England, France, the US and increasingly the USSR. The more the US dominates Canada, the more Canadians resist. The US would like us to be divided among ourselves on the basis of race, or anything else for that matter. But any struggle against racism without the objective of uniting all Canadians against US imperialism is purely diversionary. This is what SDS is.

Mr. Woodhouse almost admits the truth of this by stating: "During the past five years, a number of academics, particularly in the US have made a concerted effort to resurrect the notion that blacks are intellectually inferior to whites." This is admission that the main source of this racism is the US.

We have two suggestions: either Mr. Woodhouse fights racism as part of the national liberation struggle of Canada, or he goes back to the US to fight this racism at its source.

Finally, Mr. Woodhouse ends up his letter with this sentence: "The question to be asked is whether we wish to allow 'academic freedom' to justify a resurgence of that eugenics movement throughout the western world." The man starts off his letter with a tirade against the requirement of citizenship, which is a perfectly legitimate demand, and ends up talking about eugenics! Again, he states that the source of this movement was US and Britain and not Canada. This comparison of the movement for the breeding of a "super race" to a demand for citizenship is ridiculous. You can become a Canadian citizen no matter what race you belong to. If you want to.

It is obvious that Mr. Woodhouse is either supremely ignorant of the political problems of Canada, or he is throwing about red herrings to try to confuse us.

But, as we said earlier, his letter confirms our convictions about the correctness of the demands of the 85 per cent Canadian Quota Campaign.

New Hogtown unplugged

In my typescript of the review of Highrise and Superprofits (November 30), it was stated that the book was "published by Dumont Press Graphix/Available at New Hogtown Press, 12 Hart House Circle."

But the Review editor shortened this to "Dumont Press Graphix/New Hogtown Press". Instead of seeing a plug for an on-campus distributor, readers got the impression that New Hogtown was co-publisher.

PC club leader 'totalitarian'

Mr. Steadman's letter of November 28, where he considers student protest to the Discipline Code (in their varying but united ways through groups such as SDS, CPL, RMG, the CP and others) as anarchistic and rabble-oriented, appeared to me, at first as a ludicrous put-on. When I realized, later on, however, that he is the leader of U of T's Progressive (sic) Conservative club I found his view to be very disconcerting and utterly totalitarian.

Come on Mr. Steadman, let's not turn back the clock — in his reference to Athenian conservatism — and proselytize a form of reactionary fascism

GAA clarifies its position

Although I am grateful to the Varsity for its continuing coverage of the Graduate Assistants' Association, I feel that Friday's article on the UTSA mailing contained some serious errors, both in substance and in suggestion. I would like to clarify the GAA position on this issue.

In the first place, the GAA did not charge UTSA or the university with interference in our organizing drive, though this was the implication of your headline. Neither did we ask for nor receive the support of CLC regional director Harry Simon, who reportedly made such a charge. The facts are that the Varsity reporter contacted Mr. Simon and explained the situation as HE (not the GAA) perceived it, thus eliciting Mr. Simon's response.

Secondly, while we regret the timing of the mailing, we have no evidence which indicates that this was intentional. Given the overwhelming bureaucratization of this university, I would not be surprised if it did indeed take months to plan such a mailing. Furthermore, we do not attach a great deal of importance to this event. The GAA is a strong and vigorous organization and we do not feel particularly threatened by UTSA. The fact that the university did turn over the GAA lists we had requested was of much more significance to us than was the UTSA mailing.

Finally, while we have no illusions about the university's position, in the broadest context, on labor-management relations, we see no reason to engage in any unnecessary confrontations. We are confident that we can succeed on the basis of the real issues that confront GAA on this campus. The creation of false issues will serve only to confuse the real ones.

Baha'is oppose discrimination

Human Rights Day on December 10 should remind us that one of the most basic and still unachieved human rights is freedom from prejudice. Discrimination or unjust restriction of action under any pretext poisons our relationship with our neighbors and creates conflict which threatens our civilization. "Beware of prejudice. Light is good in whatever lamp it is burning. A rose is beautiful in whatsoever garden it may bloom. A star has the same radiance whether it shines from the East or the West" (Baha'i Writings).

Equal opportunities for developing their unique capacities are the right of all individuals. Baha'is believe that the recognition that mankind belongs to one family under one God brings with it the responsibility to respect and help one another in every way.

SDS's WASPness disputed

In the November 30 issue of The Varsity, members of the university community were endowed with an "in depth" analysis of the burning of the Toike by Doug Hooton, assistant editor of the Toike.

It is obvious, from this letter, that the editorial staff of the Toike, even in The Varsity, cannot refrain from stereotyped ethnic slander. Reference to SDS'ers as carrying the "Waspman's burden" typifies the racism which so vividly permeates the Toike and undoubtedly the minds of its editors. Moreover how this esteemed editor came to the conclusion that most of the members of SDS are Wasps is beyond me. I suppose through his perceptive ethnic humour, he has been able to characterize the appearance of a WASP with one glance.

Also the angry reaction of a number of women to sexist comments like "Take it off" was fully justified. Again the Toike assistant editor was blinded by his sexism and only perceived such reactions as being "sexually predisposed" or motivated by a "chip on their shoulder". This in itself has disgusting sexist overtones.

Finally, there definitely were ethnic groups representatives who accompanied the engineers, many of whom were greatly disturbed by the outbursts of racism and sexism during the confrontation and many of whom stayed after the burning for an analytical discussion of ethnic slander and racism. It is quite evident that Mr. Hooton didn't stay, thus perceiving the burning in the usual superficial, and inane manner so often portrayed in the Toike.

Certainly I for one thank the assistant editor for revealing the inspirational source of the Toike.

Marxism popular but not practical

With the mass of current pro-Marxist propaganda one finds at U of T, I feel compelled to personally commend Jim McLean for his anti-Marxist article in Toike-Oike (November 15.).

It was obviously meant as an insult to its rival, The Varsity. However, those who have some insight into the present social and economic conditions of socialist countries should look beyond this and treat the subject as valid. Unfortunately, the situation is rarely understood by anyone who is not, or has not come into contact with Estonian, Latvian, Lithuanian, or Czech, (etc.) immigrants. These people will tell you the state in which they left their country, and that they were forced to escape. They'll tell you about the sorrowful letters they receive from friends and relatives talking of suicide, abortions, drinking problems and the lack of basic, everyday freedoms in life.

If you are interested in how a communist country is run, talk to those who have lived in one, not to those who are full of hot air, and may be "safely" marxist in a capitalist country.

I am not trying to put down any newspaper, any particular marxist, or even Marx himself, but rather communism as a practical form of government.

Today it is "fashionable" to be marxist to put down the latent errors of capitalism—as if one had made some brilliant discovery in depth, then to put down the incredibly obvious flaws of communism, as we have seen it in effect, past and present.

Forget lights - use secret tunnel

Given the inevitable City Hall bureaucracy to contend with, a Queen's Park traffic light, it seems, could not possibly be installed before spring of next year, even if all the politicians involved in the decision magically became unanimously sympathetic to your cause. Therefore, whether or not the traffic light is justifiable, we will be muddling on without for, at the minimum, months to come. In all your recent reportage of the need for lights, you haven't mentioned an alternative crossing point that is completely safe and relatively traffic-free: the roadway running under Queen's Park Crescent into Hart House Circle, about 100 yards south of Hart House. Publicizing this crossing is, in the short term, more constructive than harping on the hassles involved in getting the lights.

Confessions of an art reviewer

My snippet of a review on the Burtram Brooker show has apparently angered certain people. I write this letter because, upon reflection, I find their anger justified. Not hedging from the substance of my review — I don't think that Brooker was a very good or a very significant painter — I do apologize for tone of the review. Reading it in print, I discovered (independently) that it bristled with a self-serving contempt completely inappropriate for reviews of this kind. This tone was certainly unintentional and I plead guilty to an inability to throw away what I considered to be a witty turn of phrase but which in retrospect I find to be both unquitty and inappropriate. Art reviewers need criticism too.

Firestone strike continues in Joliette

By CAM FORD and ANNE McLEAN
CANADIAN UNIVERSITY PRESS

"After eight months of the strike, the struggle of the 300 people of Joliette against the Firestone company has become the struggle of the union movement against multi-national corporations who insist on considering Québec as a place for cheap labour," charged Louis Labege, head of the 250,000 member Quebec Federation of Labor (QFL).

The strike in Joliette, Québec, is another milestone in the labor struggle in Québec. The Québec government and the multi-national corporation have combined in attempts to break the eight month long strike for parity of Québec workers with their counterparts in Ontario.

Although the Joliette Firestone workers have established North American production records, they are still paid $1.29 an hour less than their Ontario counterparts — $3.06 compared to $4.35. They are seeking an original increase of $0.70 an hour, $0.26 more in January and again in June to bring them up to par with the lowest paid workers at the Firestone plant in Hamilton, Ontario.

Negotiations broke down Thursday, November 28, after the company came up with what was supposed to be its "big offer." Rumors had been circulated by the company that there was to be a major breakthrough. But when it came to the bargaining table, the company had upped its offer from $0.45 to $0.55.

"The company negotiators said that they did not have a mandate to meet the union's minimum demands, so we told them to go and get the mandate," Fernand Daoust, secretary-general of the QFL, told reporters in announcing that talks had broken down.

The offer of $0.55 an hour does not constitute a firm offer; it is conditional on the settlement of all other points by arbitration. The union feels that the company is trying to starve it out until after the new year and warns that it will revert immediately to the workers' original request for salary parity with their Ontario counterparts.

The union is expected to hold out since the strikers' spirits are high. To combat the despair that often sets in during a long strike, the union has organized political education classes three nights a week which are attended by the workers and their wives. (Strike pay is $25.00 a week.)

Louis Labege, QFL president, feels the union movement cannot afford to lose this strike: "If we lose this strike, we will never win another in Québec." The multi-national corporations, with help from the Québec government, will probably realize they will be able to starve out any union strike if they can break this one, which has also won the support of the Confederation of National Trade Unions and the Québec Teachers Federation.

Firestone in Joliette since 1965

The history of the Firestone plant is another example of the colonialist attitude of the multi-national corporations towards Québec. Firestone came to Joliette in 1965 with huge subsidies from the Québec government. The $45,000,000 operation was to provide 300 jobs for the men of the town.

The mayor and the town notables of Joliette welcomed the multi-national corporation by creating a new boulevard, Firestone Boulevard, on the northern outskirts of town. Enthusiasm ran high and rumours circulated that high salaries were to be paid at the new plant.

The cream of the town's young men, 18-20 years old, in perfect health, bilingual, and with high school education, were hired with promises of quick advancement if they performed well.

One-third of the workers were put on a piecework system, in other words the faster they worked, the more money they got. It also meant that the faster they worked on the assembly line, the faster their fellow workers on the line, who were not on piecework, had to work to keep up to them.

When the workers started breaking North American production records, they were given a big party with door prizes of (what else) tires, and even a color TV. Other lavish rewards included a one cent-an-hour increase for everyone, followed by a two-cent increase two weeks later.

In the following weeks, to continue the record-setting pace, management introduced a system of "rewards and incentives" whereby the work team that produced more tires than the others over a certain period of time would get free beer at the nearest tavern.

Morale down, union makes first demands

However ulcer cases and nervous depression began to appear among the men, and the honeymoon atmosphere began to pall. The first union demands were put forward: equal work for equal pay and adequate working conditions. Joliette Firestone's first strike lasted three months, stretching through the fall and winter of 1969-70.

The company responded to these first signs of militancy by hiring a few Francophone management personnel, (as the union put it, "At last, we were being exploited in French.") but working conditions grew worse as Firestone retaliated with pressure for increased production and strict policing of the workers by foremen and lower management personnel. So the workers organized a slow-down, forcing Firestone to regulate 13 outstanding grievances.

The company then introduced efficiency schemes, whereby workers who suggested Joliette. "They won't need a very large truck" (if they decide to leave), Labege retorted when questioned about the rumor.

The thrice-weekly politicization classes have an average attendance of over 200 per week. Attendance has been good because morale is high, and the 50 member organizing committee says it will continue classes throughout the strike. Following the guidelines set out in a manual published by the Labor Council of Joliette, sessions have been held on the history of the trade union movement, the Unemployment Insurance Act, Workman's Compensation, the history of Québec, as well as discussions on the situation in Chile and the nature of capitalism.

The orientation of the QFL union's classes is representative of the turn which the union movement has taken in the last two or three years. Both the QFL and the CNTU are channelling considerable energy into political education. For the 2,000 workers in the province currently on strike and waiting for settlement, these classes provide a place to meet and means of maintaining solidarity during an extended strike.

Meetings of workers' wives are being held

The Firestone strikers have also made a call to the province's 600,000 union members to contribute $0.25 a week to the strike to enable them to launch a new program of action to put more pressure on the company. It will also help the 312 strikers about to face the Québec winter.

If there is great support for the program, called "Operation $0.25 to win", a permanent fund could be set up to help other strikers throughout Québec.

Rallies of support throughout the province have been held and more are being planned in the near future.

The company's efforts to break the strike have included such measures as the announcement of the cancellation of a supposed expansion program which would have provided an increase of some 400 jobs for the town, ads in the local paper denouncing the strikers' position as irresponsible and stories in the Power Corporation-owned paper paraphrasing the company ads.

The union has had to fight the adverse publicity in the city by the company and its friends who are attempting to undermine it. The company hired a Montréal lawyer, a professional negotiator with over 30 years the hard chargers from Firestone

how to streamline the operation, even at the cost of their own jobs, were rewarded by having color photos of themselves shaking hands with the bosses posted on the bulletin boards.

A safety campaign was also initiated in which the company promised a draw for a ski-doo if there was not a work accident in a one-year period.

Now the company is trying to make an example of the "militant" Québec laborers. There have been rumors that the company will close down and leave Québec if the provincial government does not deal with the militants and the troublemakers in the labor movement.

The union reply to that is: "It is better to have a company leave Québec if it cannot accept proper working conditions for its workers".

Union organizes to withstand long strike

The QFL is hinting at a worker-takeover of the plant if Firestone decides to pull out of to find ways to build support for the strike among other women. Considering the problems of feeding a family on $25 a week, the anti-strike sentiment of some wives is understandable. But, breaking down women's isolation in separate homes is one way of breaking down their sense of helplessness and futility, and building their union consciousness.

Picketing of the plant has ceased because of an injunction brought by the company to limit the numbers of picketers to four at one time. The company's force of 50 security guards has used dogs and even a helicopter to intimidate the strikers and the Québec police have assisted. So the QFL has launched a boycott of Firestone products

Firestone boycott begun

The boycott has been picked up by the Québec Teachers Federation, the CNTU and citizen groups that have picketed the Firestone outlets around the province service, to "put us in a boat and take us for a ride". The company also sent letters to all strikers telling them how much money they had lost and urging them to return to work

Grievances still unresolved

Other major points still to be settled, along with wages, include limitation of overtime, language of work, protection against technological change and grievance procedures. The strikers feel that they should be able to work in their native tongue and want retraining when jobs are phased out and replaced by new ones.

The union is willing to sit down and talk at any time, according to Fernand Daoust, as soon as the company comes forward with a serious offer. In the interim, workers are not sitting down, but organizing so that the strike action does not become another victim of management-government co-operation like the Murdochville or Asbestos strikes during the Duplessis regime in Québec.

One year after: liberals and reformers divided

By WAYNE ROBERTS

The city hall reform movement appears to be devouring its own children. It's only a year since the Globe shrieked: "A Reformist sweep!" It's only a year since the "people-power" were ecstatic over a millennium that was to be ushered in.

Now, one year later, a lot of people are thinking that the Globe headline may have been more insightful than was intended. There's a lot of talk about disappointments, about honeymoons that are over, and even about regroupments of reformers.

Toronto's history reveals other reformers

However it's not the first time that Hogtown has witnessed a falling out among the righteous. Toronto's first mayor, the revolutionary William Lyon Mackenzie, had a few problems when, as a master printer, he had to smash a strike of his own workmen.

Also Mayor Howland's remains have been recently rediscovered by U of T historian, Des Morton. As mayor in the 1880's, Howland tried to take the pig out of Hogtown and transform it into Toronto the Good. As a "citizen's" and not a "people's" mayor, Howland was at the center of a typical late nineteenth century reform constellation of methodist and capitalist moralizers and temperance advocates who dished out morality with the right hand while pocketing a few coins from the left.

This coalition went down to defeat on the reefs of plebian class culture resistant to middle class moral reform and the disgrace of a few beams of scandal being pulled from the eyes of some of the more prominent reformers. And as a footnote to the death of this reform coalition, at least three of the prominent backers entered the twentieth century as some of the most hated enemies of the labour movement of that era.

The fate of this coalition, in short, offers little of immediate relevance for an historical judgement of today's council. It simply adds a little relish to our weeks at the modern day reformer's nose.

The "people's Jimmie", Toronto's socialist mayor of the 1930's was another victim of a well-orchestrated reform score of this century. Inheriting a Toronto in deep depression, he made some desperate attempts to provide some elementary relief for Toronto's unemployed and even took on the auto with a proposed auto tax to encourage the use of public transportation.

Raising the mill rate to an impossible level, Toronto's best-known socialist of the twentieth century went down to defeat in flaming orange for his refusal to subsidize private school Catholic textbooks. Although he polled the highest vote ever for a candidate opposed by all of Toronto's papers, his heritage offers little more than a reminder that a socialist can't make a city work in a capitalist country deep in the middle of a depression.

Conservative label inaccurate

So, history offers us little in the judgement of this council. Although there's a lot of old Toronto in the council, what with its accent on preservation, direct historical parallels are hard to impose. This team is the product of the radicalization and struggles of the last decade and bears no marks of historical hangovers or handers.

Some commentators have tried to liken the council's resistance to some of the Grey Cup hoopla to the old Toronto stuffiness of uptight Hogtown. In reality, it is more of a tribute to the women's liberation movement and its advocates, who do not identify a good time with the objectification of women in a beauty contest.

Similarly, the council's support of an equal rights statement brought before it by Toronto's gay movement, its support of last year's anti-war march, of grapeworkers of the Chilean people against the junta, and the reformers support of grants to birth control and pro-abortion groups is hard to reconcile with an image of a constituency huddling together to protect an old way of life. The standard we must set for them, then, are those of reformers out to remake the modern city. That's the standard they have set for themselves.

One important facet of this is transportation policy, an area where Toronto's North American prestige is more a measure of the default of other cities than a tribute to our own. In this area the reform council has made some major initiatives toward a mass, low cost transportation policy. The two-zone fare has been abolished and Crombie and others are talking freely of free fares for suburban commuters and massive subway expansion.

Citizen participation lacking

On citizen participation, one of the more spectacular projections of the reformers, delivery has been less than immediate. A group of activists from the besieged South of St. James Town Tenants Union were ordered out of a council meeting where they came to demand some minimum security of tenure. Ward meetings were held in the summer when it was inconvenient to come. In general, it is difficult to say that City Hall has been replaced with 'soviets of popular rule'.

Although citizens groups are said to have more clout than ever before, on the real measurements of power and reliance on the people, the council's actions have been somewhat dismaying.

Council rejected election or even public scrutiny of the candidates for Metro chairman. "The candidates would be on the hot seat", Scarborough's mayor protested.

"We don't want any screwball walking in off the street and throwing questions at the ballot box. That's citizen participation. Elections are just popularity contests", said Scarborough controller Karl Mallette.

Metro chairman Paul Godfrey himself is the sort who likes citizen participation at the ballot box. "That's citizen participation that's effective and really inexpensive", he claims. Short of that, he prefers Gallup polls to citizen's groups. And no-one has yet discredited alderman John Sewell's prediction that Godfrey would win this powerful post for two reasons: "He is acceptable to the Conservative Party in Queen's Park and he is acceptable to the development industry".

The same can be said about other incidents of real power. The power of the police, so recently dramatized by the Artistic Woodwork strike, is far removed from the power of citizens. Although most of the reform candidates for the one open position on the police commission advocated greater responsibility to the public, police chief Adamson was firm in his rebuke. "I must make unpopular decisions and I must have backing", he insisted.

Pattern followed in civil service

The civil service has proven to be another untouchable. Former mayoralty candidate Rotenberg made some insightful comments, flavored with sour grapes, about the major appointments of the Council following the same procedures as previous councils despite all the apparently democratic hoopla.

Government red tape is generally scored for a variety of problems that the council has been unable to get to, including even violations of building, fire and health codes.

Meanwhile Graham Emslie, city commissioner and virtual "laison person" with the property industry, continues to rule supreme and operate as he did in the previous council — as a city-paid lobbyist for the development industry (this according to alderman Karl Jaffary.)

On all major counts then, this council has fallen far short of its stated aims of redistributing power in favor of the mass of the population.

The other major issue crucial to a judgement of the reform council is development. It is true that reformers have made a number of interesting initiatives in this area. In his inaugural address, Crombie promised that the city itself would go into the non-profit housing business, and the city has already bought up a number of properties. But, with public housing starts down 83 per cent so far this year, there's a slack that they won't be able to make a dent in.

Meanwhile private developers continue to dominate and ride roughshod over housing needs. The council has not even come to grips with the most elementary needs of highrise tenants subject to skyrocketing rents.

David Crombie was the darling of the reformers, but to some, the honeymoon is now over.

There is also room for legitimate disappointment in their handling of the question of development in established communities. The Quebec-Gothic development which to alderperson Elizabeth Eayrs "symbolized what the election was all about" has been treated with kid gloves. All the moderates on the reform side are afraid to violate the agreement arrived at by the previous years' development-oriented council. But, as alderman Dan Heap says, there's no basis at Quebec-Gothic for court action "unless property speculators should expect us to fulfill their wildest expectations" (of co-operation).

Sewell: honeymoon over

The controversy that disagreements over this issue sparked prompted Sewell to take the position that the honeymoon is over between the different reform blocs. The exchange between Crombie and Sewell was highly significant.

"Being the government doesn't mean you've got the power to change the rules", Crombie insisted. But the rules are set up for the development industry, replied Sewell. However, asserted Crombie, "It's not whether you change the rules but how you go about changing them. People have to have a sense of certainty about the government. If you change the rules, how do you provide continuity for people who expect predictability in their government? Good reform allows for continuity and change at the same time". And with the honeymoon over, Sewell concluded, "Today happened to be the breaking point for me." The alliance between liberals and reformers was showing serious splits. It could not come to grips with the major problems of class and power in the community.

Toronto City Hall has now allegedly been brought under the control of the masses.

The same problem is bound to emerge in the handling of the controversial city-wide limit on building size. A split has already occurred between those who would use it as a club and those who would use it as a tool in dealing with the development industry. Most commentators are predicting that Crombie will be lining up more and more with the old guard in giving this by-law rubber teeth. Exemptions may well become the rule.

'Liberal' - 'reformer' split

In the year ahead tension between the "liberals" and "reformers" in the reform bloc are likely to become the highlight of civic politics. The issues that will be raised will go to the roots of the coalition.

"At one point there was a certain proper alliance between the neighbourhood protection tendency and the low income housing tendency," says Heap. "The old slogans of opposing developers bridged the two". Heap plans to fight more and more for mass low cost, tenant-controlled public housing which is sure to test the allegiances of his reform cohorts.

And, assuming many agree on the aims, there are still big questions of how you deal with power, with carrots or sticks. There's even the question of whether Toronto is an adequate unit of urban transformation. "You can't have socialism in one city," says militant alderperson Dorothy Thomas. "We're affected by decisions at Metro and Queen's Park, and in Ottawa." "And in Washington", added Heap.

Indeed, its going to be important to do more than watch the evolution of Toronto's council. "The people elected this council with a mandate to change the urban environment, then went home to wait for it to happen", lamented reformer Colin Vaughan. "That vacuum is being filled gradually by groups violently opposed to the belief of the people who elected us".

And that perhaps is the final word of assessment of the first year of Toronto's reform council. The necessary regroupments may have their focus inside of City Hall. But the real impetus is going to have to come from without.

The 'old guard' years featured several protracted residents' battles, such as the one in south of St. Jamestown (above).

Rape suspect nabbed, but security still up

Thirteen rapes were reported this year on and around the campus area beginning last December and coming to an abrupt halt in the summer. Police say they have now apprehended the suspect.

Victims at Whitney Hall reported an attempted rape last spring followed a few weeks later by an actual rape. The actual rape took place in the victim's room last May at around 2 am.

Similar rapes were allegedly committed at St. Hilda's and the Graduate Student residence at St. George and Bloor streets.

Descriptions of the rapist's method of attack established the crimes were committed by the same person believed to have been living at that time in the Annex area north of Bloor Street. Nine crimes of rape were reported from this area.

During the summer months security in the area was tight. Police and plainclothes men guarded the campus around the clock. The rapist was, according to the knowledge of the police at Division 52, apprehended in Vancouver. The danger seemed over.

rape in Metropolitan Toronto has increased 76 per cent in six years.

Or has it? Changes in social attitudes would indicate the increase may be, not in the act of rape, but rather, in the act of reporting it.

Through the education of the women's liberation movement, women are shedding their conditioned shame-fear notions of rape (notions which allow men the prerogative of rape) and are emerging to indignantly protest the crime of assault-aggression and physical power.

The only sections offering advice on assertive action read: "Use any available object for a weapon such as an umbrella or purse." and, "Aim for vital parts and make it hurt. Gouge eyes and scratch with fingernails. Dig heels into his instep, kick shins."

Clearly this advice reflects preconceived notions of the female as incapable in the arena of physical combat. It is well known there are more effectual about the class.

Excluding women working on campus there are about 14,000 females circulating on the St. George campus. This figure includes full time, extension and part time female students.

Of that number, approximately 2,300 live on campus. This figure includes women's residences, men's and women's residences, married student's residences and campus co-operative residences.

The campus then is a likely prowling area for a rapist, although statistics at 52 Division reveal the university is a relatively safe place compared to the rest of Metro Toronto.

Contrary to common notion, rape is not an arbitrary act of violence. Studies of rape in North American culture reveal most rape is in fact premeditated.

Who are the rapists? A Philadelphia study by Dr. Menachem Amir shows three of five rapists are married and lead normal sex lives at home.

They are healthy, young men primarily between the ages of 17 and 30. Studies reveal men imprisoned for rape are "normal" people. Can we conclude rape is an

However, this fall another campus rape was reported. The victim this time was raped in a washroom in the basement of Sydney Smith Hall. Police report it was not the same person responsible for the previous rapes.

While campus and Metro police say there is no immediate cause for alarm, security precautions continue in operation across the campus.

All loiterers and/or suspicious-looking persons are being reported to the police. Entrance doors to women's residences are being kept locked. Identification or keys now admit persons into residences. Porters are, in the main, on duty around the clock.

Chain locks have been put on dormitory room doors. Some buildings have had bars installed on lower windows. At the Graduate Student residence a gate is being installed to block off free access to the inner court and entrance doors to the residence. Staff and students have been alerted.

But perhaps one of the most effective weapons against rape now is the woman herself. Statistics would indicate that to their bodies.

Women are more willing now to endure the distasteful process of court proceedings leading to a court conviction for the rapist, a process which has previously allowed rapists to get away with their crime.

Women interviewed on campus uniformly agree they want to know the facts about rape on campus, and moreover, they want to do something positive about it.

When shown the Metropolitan Toronto police pamphlet for women on rape, most women agreed "Operation Checkmate" wouldn't do the trick.

"It's obviously written from a male point of view," one said. "Did they consult any women?" she asked. She thought the pamphlet accomplished the opposite of what was needed.

The emphasis in the pamphlet on negative precautions (what not to do) and the use of the words "avoiding," "screaming," "running," in fact reinforces an assumed vulnerability on the part of the female while nourishing the male's already well-established sense of tive methods of self-protection.

Women would be better advised to look at the problem from a woman's point of view. An American-based group, Women Against Rape, have issued a pamphlet entitled Stop Rape, which emphasises positive action women can take to foil or stop an attack of a rapist.

The pamphlet features pictures illustrating simple effective moves which can be used against a would-be attacker as well as offering practical advice and encouragement.

At the Benson Building, enrolment in self-defense classes is increasing. Karate is the predominantly taught method although some women are learning judo as well.

Ever since the course began a year ago, interest has been keen. The number of women going on to advanced classes has increased. "As a matter of fact," said an instructor, "there is too much crowding at the top. But we don't mind that."

A large percentage of women pass the yellow belt level examination. No doubt inspired by a unique sense of physical value, the women are very enthusiastic accepted part of the definition of a normal male?

Dr. Amir says: "Studies indicate that sex offenders do not constitute a unique or psychopathological type; nor are they as a group invariably more disturbed than the control groups to which they are compared."

Women can give themselves a Christmas present by enrolling in a self-defense class for second term. Be aware of the problem of rape. It exists, even though our society doesn't want to recognize it.

Co-operate with persons trying to enforce safety precautions. Report immediately any crime of rape, attempted or founded. Do not destroy any evidence of an attack, which includes not taking a bath.

Do not let a desire for anonymity stand in your way of reporting a rape crime. Police will readily accept an anonymous phone call on a rape crime.

A description of the rapist and the method of attack—anything you can remember—will assist the police in apprehending a suspected rapist.

Government stand on aboriginal rights attacked

By ANDREW FALUDY

MP Flora MacDonald (PC — Kingston and the Islands) strongly attacked the federal government's stand on Indian aboriginal rights Wednesday night.

Speaking at the St. Lawrence Centre to about 300 people she said she felt there was a "much greater sense of urgency" about aboriginal rights.

Aboriginal rights, based on the natives' claim that they have been on the land thousands of years before the arrival of the white man, are particularly in focus at present.

It is on the basis of these rights that the Cree Indians in the James Bay area of Quebec hope to retain their livelihood in the face of the massive development which threatens to destroy their way of life.

MacDonald's attack came after Marie Marule of the National Indian Brotherhood quoted from a speech made by Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau in August 1969 in which he asserted Indians had no legal or aboriginal rights, and the only obligations the government had towards them were moral.

"Aboriginal rights were never in doubt until the prime minister's statement," MacDonald said.

"They have been accepted by every single government since confederation," she added.

MacDonald also commented on the length of time the suit to halt the James Bay development had been before the courts.

"The final ruling of the court may be academic," By the time this comes about, she said, "(the Indians) way of life will be destroyed."

MacDonald suggested the James Bay issue was not purely provincial.

"It is the constitutional responsibility of the federal government to step into the negotiations on the side of the aboriginal rights," she said.

Also present at the forum was Judd Buchanan, Liberal MP and chairman of the parliamentary committee on Indian affairs.

Buchanan spoke of a "new relationship" with Indians and expressed his confidence the "problem can be resolved." How and when, he did not say.

The two remaining members of the five man panel were Professor Walter Currie of Trent University, himself an Indian, and Tony Hooper, law professor at York University's Osgoode law school.

Hooper compared the conduct of Quebec premier Robert Bourassa and his government to "the feudal barons out to crush the peasants."

A member of the audience disagreed with this comparison, contending while feudal barons could occasionally be executed for their conduct, the present government could not.

The multi-billion dollar scheme for hydro-electric power development next to James Bay has a long and interesting background.

Plans have been under consideration since 1964 but until 1971 all the proposals which came before the Quebec assembly were defeated.

However, after the 1970 Quebec provincial election, Bourassa announced the project would go ahead as a part of his election promise to provide over 100,000 new jobs by the end of 1971.

Bourassa predicted the project would furnish between 125,000 and 135,000 new jobs. These jobs would not be permanent because of the decrease in employment after the completion of the project, which was expected to be achieved by 1980.

The project called for new roads, dams and hydro-electric power stations. It also called for the flooding of more than 5,000 square miles of territory and the seizure of property which Indians claim is theirs by aboriginal right.

In May of 1972, the Quebec Indian Association filed law suits against the contractors and provincial agencies handling the project.

The law suits were primarily sparked off because 6,000 Cree Indians were in danger of losing their land and way of life.

Since then, experts have predicted climactic changes, damage to wildlife in the area and changes in the spawning habits of fish.

The hearings of the case finally got underway in December 1972 and lasted six months.

It took Mr. Justice Albert Malouf another five months to write his 170 page report on the issue. On November 14 he issued a temporary injunction to halt the project.

Many newspapers and broadcasters reported the injunction was being ignored in Quebec, and work was proceeding as normal.

Malouf ruled Bourassa and his government had violated the natives' rights and must negotiate the surrender of the land with the Indian people.

Rather than do this, the Quebec Appeal Court overturned Malouf's injunction only eight days after he delivered it.

The case is at present before the Supreme Court of Canada which has taken the native appeal under advisement and is expected to take about a week to reach a decision.

Herstoric calendar

Herstory is an appointment calendar-notebook-history book. A small group of Saskatchewan women formed a Calendar Collective, and with the assistance of OFY funding, have compiled a wide variety of material pertaining to Canadian Women. "The calendar format was chosen as a design that would provide a visually exciting and inspiring outline of the struggles and achievements of Canadian women."

There is a great variety of graphics and information on every page of this 1974 calendar. Each even numbered page contains a biography, quotation, history poem, song, drawing or photograph, each one revealing some perspective of women's life in Canada.

Day pages lie opposite the historical and graphic material, seven days comprising a page. Each day specifies an event which occurred on that day, and beneath leaves enough room for readers to jot down their notes for that day.

Sketches are presented on such topics as Women and Religion, Pioneer Women, Women and the Media, Suffrage, Childcare, Women and Work, Women and the War Industry, and Marriage.

Biographies of such well weathered feminists as Emily Howard Stowe, Augusta Stowe-Gullen, Cora Hind, Pauline Johnson and Dorise Nielsen are complemented by rustic, sometimes melodramatic old photographs.

Less well known Canadian women also appear. Zara Nelsova, Maria Campbell, Minna Keene, Therese Casgrain and Mary Panagoshio Cousins are ultimately as important as their more publicized contemporaries.

These women are not fanatical individuals, but ordinary women aspiring to fulfill their basic interests in life. Nellie McClung prophesied: "Women are going to form a chain, a greater sisterhood than the world has ever known." Within the framework of this calendar, we begin to realize that history is an on-going process of revealing people and events of the past; the stories of all these women weave into a single pattern of the history of women in Canada.

The dedication of the calendar reveals the aspirations of the Saskatoon Calendar Collective, as well as those of the publishers, the Canadian Women's Educational Press:

"At last we have only skimmed the surface. The wide range of the subject warrants even greater study and attention than has been possible here. The changing pattern of Canadian life can be made bright with threads of devotion, strong with the will and the determination of our people; and who will deny that we women... have a share in the building of our Canadian homeland? It is to these women, whoever they are... who will in their own way work towards the ideal of free and happy womanhood, and thereby a free and happier world, (we) dedicate this book."

Dorise Nielsen, November, 1944.

Herstory is the fifth publication of the Canadian Women's Educational Press, a collective publishing group which focusses on issues of importance to Canadian women.

Ideas: The spark we run on

Hoechst develops a constant stream of new ideas to keep its research pointed in the right directions. Ideas about what is needed, ideas about what is wanted, ideas about what is possible, ideas about what is probable in the light of a constantly changing, ever-increasing body of basic knowledge.

Imagination steers the ship

Imagination is a prime source of the new ideas Hoechst uses constantly in order to keep developing better products — more effective medicines, better chemical and industrial materials. Imagination is only half the battle, but when good ideas are properly teamed with the discipline of applied research, they constitute a formidable force in the search for improved products in every area of modern life.

Helping Build Canada

Products and ideas from Hoechst have touched and improved the quality of people's lives in every area around the world, in a hundred countries on six continents. As an affiliate of the worldwide Hoechst organizations Canadian Hoechst Limited has a full century of research and achievement to draw upon. In Canada, Hoechst is an autonomous company employing Canadians to serve Canadian needs.

Hoechst in Canada concerns itself with supplying both the present and future needs of Canadians. The range of products and services covers the spectrum through industrial chemicals, dyestuffs, plastics, printing plates, human and veterinary medicines, pharmaceuticals, and textile fibres. Hoechst techniques and know-how in these fields, combined with a large international fund of experience, have given the company a reputation for expertise which takes constant striving to live up to. Rafting with the Bertons: a myth exposed Pierre Berton is the great Canadian mythologist. He's also an ace journalist, muckraker of sorts and owner of what are perhaps the finest set of sideburns on television. (Some people have to fake sideburns, growing their hair in long strands from the tops of their heads down. Not Berton. You can tell that each hair of his impeccable pair of white thatches is anchored securely in the skin around the ears.)

With the new interest in Canadian economic nationalism, mythologists have become more important. Nationalism requires a popular appreciation of the nation's history, a symbolic representation of its common cultural roots and experiences. In other words, nationalism requires that history be translated into myths. Americans have had myths all along — the myth of the Revolution, the myth of the frontier, the myth of the promised land. In the past, Canada has been lazy and appropriated American myths. But now our mythologists are on the rise. Now we have films (like Jutra's Kamouraska — a movie about not passion in icy Quebec), novels about the Riel rebellion, (The Temptations of Big Bear) plays about Ontario's historical arch-criminals, the Black Donnellys (Sticks and Stones) and we have Pierre Berton.

Berton is one of the best and certainly one of the most influential mythologists around. He is (very loosely speaking) to Canada's past what Homer was to the Trojan Wars. In his Klondike (1958) — a kind of readable documentary of the 1898 gold rush — Berton sang the myth of the North, of determined men battling the environment of a hostile land and inadvertently creating a nation. His 1970-71 railway duology The National Dream and the Last Spike, played on the same theme — only this time centring around the construction of the CPR.

Berton's individuals-against-the-odds approach doesn't make particularly good history (the skulduggery, ruthlessness and just plain cruelty of his railway promoters in the CPR books is always subtly justified by an implicit Canadian version of manifest destiny). But it makes good reading — and it's popular. With over 150,000 copies of each of his major books in print, Berton is the most influential of that group of writers trying to discover and/or create what we used to call in high school "the Canadian identity".

Not only does Berton make myths; as Canada's (very loosely speaking, Homer) he's a part of the myth.

For years, those of us who couldn't avoid Canadian television watched Pierre Berton, Gordon Sinclair and Toby Robbins (later to become Betty Kennedy) square off against hidden guests on the CBC's Front Page Challenge. Usually Berton was the one who guessed the mystery headline first. ("He's a smart one, that Pierre Berton," my mother would say, as our family sat those Timmins Tuesday nights, watching the Front Page panel, under the bland but benign guidance of moderator Fred Davis, demolish another challenger.)

In southern Ontario you could catch Berton moderating Under Attack, or asking incisive and provocative questions on the Pierre Berton Show, or exchanging incisive and provocative remarks with Charles Templeton (whose sideburns are not quite as good, and who way back when, moderated a television panel show somewhat less successful than Front Page Challenge).

Other members of Canada's media elite have rounded out the Berton myth with frequent articles in Maclean's (Berton was a former editor), then Toronto Star (Berton was a former columnist) and Weekend Magazine. From them, we learn how fast Berton writes (very fast), where he lives (a rambling house in Kleinburg) and what he thinks (a lot). The lore of Pierre Berton, the boy from the Yukon who became a newspaper editor at some incredibly young age, and never looked back has been, for me anyway, an integral part of Canadian folkways.

Perhaps it's only natural that a myth-writer, who himself is mythologized would finally choose to contribute to his own tale. Berton does so in Drifting Home.

Drifting Home is the account of a raft trip that Berton and his family took down the Yukon River in 1972. It's interspersed with Berton's memories of his own Yukon youth and juxtaposed with an account of his father's life in the early days after the goldrush. Not only does Drifting add a three-generational perspective to the Berton myth, it restates the old Bertonian theme of individual (this Friday, December 7, 1973 time Pierre's father Francis) battling the hostile elements (the Depression, a rather thoughtless government, and of course the Yukon itself). To the author, the story of his family is the story of Canada, albeit in microcosm.

But it's a dull book.

Popular of course. According to Berton's publisher, Drifting has 100,000 copies in print. But all the same, it's dull. Had it not been written by a mythological figure like Pierre Berton, it probably would never have seen print.

Unfortunately (for Berton) Drifting tarnishes his own myth. By exposing himself, he is reduced to the level of the ordinary.

Berton's strongpoint is writing about great events; he can tell a good tale if he has the material for one.

But this raft trip is not a great event; nor does it provide material for a good tale. On the first level, it is the story of a family holiday. That's all. A somewhat different family holiday, mind you — one that involves a wilderness river, three rubber rafts full of Berton kids (seven), a Berton nephew, a Berton boyfriend, four guides, a Berton wife and (as he is called in the book's 24-page color photo supplement) author. But it's not that different — it involves no drama, little interest and a lot of shmaltz.

Berton insists on sketching proud-father portraits of his family: "Peggy Anne cannot help smiling, even when she is mad at someone . . . It is not an impish grin, like Perri's or Patsie's but a true smile like her mother's — sunny, open and innocent, full of trust and good humor."

"Frankly sentimental," one reviewer called. Where I come from, we would call it suck-y. It's bad enough that all the Berton kids have names beginning with P (Peter, Pierre Berton in 1927. His trip back to old Yukon haunts means something to him, but not to anyone else.

Pierre Berton and sideburns in 1972

Paul, Perri, Patsie, Pamela, Peggy Anne, Penny) without glowing descriptions of their "puckish grins" or "pixie faces." If I were one of Berton's kids, I'd blush to see that familial gush in print. (Parenthetical testimonial: It's unfair too. I used to vaguely know one of Berton's kids; she took Anthropology 120, worked on The Varsity and wasn't suck-y.)

Of course, the raft trip is not what Drifting is really about. It is about the meeting between a man and his past, effected by the physical medium of the Yukon River. More than that, it is the meeting between the myth-maker's own history and the historical myth he has been articulating. One of the more symbolic events in the book occurs when the Berton crowd runs across the only other travellers on the river — five American tourists. The Americans, we learn, chose to travel the Yukon because they had read (what else) — Berton's Klondike.

But Berton must have felt his Klondike was insufficient. What he is trying to say here, I think, is that national history is not something abstract, but rather a sum of personal histories. In an attempt to make the national myth more meaningful, he forms a personal myth from the experience of his own family.

But he fails to make a good myth or tell a good story.

A myth is successful because it alters reality; it distances the hearer from history in such a way as to give history's characters an extra-human quality. A story, on the other hand, succeeds through its fidelity to reality, though closing the distance between listener and even so as to give its characters an all-too-human quality.

In moving from the arena of great events to that of personal events, Berton shortens the distance between listener and history just enough to make myth impossible. The people of Berton's past (his taxonomical father, his marxist grandfather, his boy scout chums) are interesting — but not interesting enough, nor awesome enough to be the material for myth.

Yet although we are too close for myth, we are not close enough to really understand their human situation — we are not being told a story.

And Drifting Home, with its full-color photo section is left as a mere album, meaningful to Berton, but not (except for the vague academic interest associated with any pioneer journal) meaningful to us.

How they shot those campus bums

On March 5, 1770, British troops fired—in self-defense, they claimed—into a rioting mob in the city of Boston. Immediately afterwards, the soldiers responsible were arrested and indicted by the British government; several were convicted of manslaughter. Nevertheless, the incident so outraged public opinion in America that the Boston Massacre, as it became known, proved an important contributing factor in the anger that led to the outbreak of the American Revolution.

Some two hundred years later, on May 4, 1970, troops of the Ohio National Guard fired into a group of demonstrating students—allegedly in self-defense—killing four, and wounding nine others, several seriously.

those bastards", the campus long-hairs. Other military and civilian officials, while not complicit, participated in a cover-up. It was more important to them to protect their system of authority, and its reputation, than to have the truth discovered, and acted on.

The major conclusions reach-protest across the country, including Kent State University in Ohio. On May 2, during the evening, the empty campus ROTC building was set on fire and burned to the ground. In the aftermath, National Guard troops were sent onto the campus although the campus authorities had not requested them, believing there was nothing in the situation that would require their presence. The use of the troops may well have been due to the determination of Ohio Governor Rhodes, on the eve of a crucial election primary, to appear as a strong law-and-order man.

the "violence" was considerably less than that which the same riot-trained troop had encountered earlier in the week during a strike. At that time, they had endured serious injuries and sniper fire without firing in return.

The Guard cleared the campus common of demonstrators, marched to a football field adjoining a parking lot, and turned to retrace its path. Some harassment of the Guard was taking place at this time. It was cluded that at least some of the guardsmen were lying in their stories. Considerable evidence was produced to support the contention that some guardsmen had planned the shooting among themselves. Despite this, the Nixon administration refused to act. The reason given was that it would be unlikely that prosecution of individual guardsmen would be successful, rather unconvincing given its claim to know that some had lied to investigators (itself a crime) and more unconvincing when put in the light of its extreme quickness to prosecute other, more questionable, conspiracy cases: the Chicago Seven, the Berrigans, Daniel Ellsberg.

"Flowers are better than bullets."

not severe enough, however, to prevent a single uniformed officer from walking through the midst of the thickest part of the crowd.

Immediately before their return march, a number of guardsmen were observed going into a huddle on the practice field. Then, as the Guard reached the crest of a small hill on their return march, a number of them whirled simultaneously and began to fire—without any warning whatever—into the parking lot below. The Guard later claimed that no order to fire had been given, that a number of men (at least 28) fired independently in self-defense. Up to the point of the gunfire, however, most of the men involved had had their backs to the students, and the distance between them and the students had been increasing constantly. No one was moving to attack the Guard; its path was clear.

When the shooting began, students began to run or take cover. Nevertheless, the Guard continued firing for 13 seconds. One of those killed, William Schroeder, was shot in the back while lying on the ground, trying to take cover. The closest victim was 70 feet from the Guard, only one of the others was within 200

With so many unanswered questions surrounding the four murders at Kent State to burden the American conscience, I find it almost incomprehensible that the U.S. Attorney General could close the official books on the May 4th tragedy while paradoxically agreeing with previous investigations that the shooting deaths were 'Unnecessary, unwarranted, and inexcusable'.
-An Ohio National Guardsman present at Kent State

It is hard to avoid the conclusion that the government decision had something to do with the unpopularity of students, and the view, held by many, that the students 'got what they had coming'.

The Truth About Kent State is an attempt to overcome that at-group of demonstrating students — allegedly in self-defense — killing four, and wounding nine others, several seriously.

ed by the FBI and the U.S. Department of Justice are the following:

"One modest suggestion for my friends in the academic community: the next time a mob of students, waving their non-negotiable demands, starts pitching bricks and rocks at the Student Union — just imagine they are wearing brown shirts or white sheets and act accordingly."

Spiro Agnew, April 1970

"(Student radicals are) the worst type of people that we harbor in America... We are going to eradicate the problem, we're not going to treat the symptoms."
Governor James Rhodes of Ohio, May 3, 1970

The shooting was not necessary and was not in order. There were no snipers; the guardsmen were never fired on. The guardsmen were not surrounded; their path was clear and unobstructed.

The Guard still had tear gas available when the gunfire took place.

At the time of the shooting, no student posed a threat to the lives of the guardsmen.

In addition, the Department of Justice stated that it had reason to believe that, subsequent to the shooting, guardsmen had conspired to fabricate their story of self-defense. Of those guardsmen who had not admitted shooting, at least two were lying.

Despite these conclusions, Attorney General John Mitchell closed the case, "satisfied that the Department (of Justice) has taken every possible action to serve justice".

So ended — at least in the courts — a story that began on April 30 when President Nixon ordered American troops to invade Cambodia.

In the first days of May, demonstrations broke out in Nevertheless, the Guard made itself busy on campus by breaking up rallies against the war. A number of students were bayoneted, with the result that many previously apathetic students became hostile to the Guard.

On May 4, a rally had been called for noon. University President White was unconcerned; he went into the town for lunch.

In his absence, National Guard General Canterbury decided to disperse the peaceful assembly. "Only when the Guard attempted to disperse the rally," reported President Nixon's Commission on Campus Unrest, "did some students react violently."

The violence took the form of sporadic rock-throwing by a few people. Only one guardsman was hurt seriously enough to require any kind of medical attention; and this individual, a Sgt. Shafer, was well enough 15 minutes after his injury was sustained, according to the FBI report, to deliberately aim at and shoot down student Joseph Lewis, standing 70 feet from the Guard, who had taunted the guardsmen with an upraised finger. For this, Lewis was maimed for life. For the guardsmen, feet. Eight of the 13 were 300 feet or more away. None, of course, were armed.

Numerous photographs exist of the shooting and the moments prior to it, from all angles. They, and much other evidence, made it easy for the US Department of Justice to conclude that the claims of the guardsmen to have acted in self-defense were "fabricated".

The immediate claim that there had been a sniper on a building was conclusively disproven; at any rate, even had there been one, this would have in no way justified shooting into the parking lot. A government investigation contituted with what was once considered a powerful weapon: the truth. The case argued sketchily in this review is put exhaustively and painstakingly, bolstered by a wealth of facts, testimony, and over 70 photographs. It stands as an indictment. Whether it can become what it subtitle claims for it, A Challenge to the American It, A Challenge to the American Conscience, remains to be seen.

Holt, Rinehart Winston, $14.95

What are you supposed to think when a big wealthy publisher puts out an arty-looking coffee table book about subsistence full of photographs just crammed with stereotyped soulfulness, yards of monologues from 'ordinary people' 'expressing themselves' ("I feel most comfortable bare-assed. I'm always running around this house bare-assed."), meaningful philosophical ruminations from the 'author' ("it is endurance that makes them endure"), and priced at $14.95? ("It is endurance that makes them endure"), and priced at $14.95? ("It is endurance that makes them endure")

I mean, what in God's name is the purpose of such an exercise? I guess there's money to be made off of those quaint backwoods poor people. Good conversation-starter for those Rosedale wine-and-cheese parties. (God knows it's sometimes hard to find new, really meaningful, things to converse about from one cocktail party to the next.)

Fuck off, goddamn condescending liberal assholes.

Potential political potboiler dribbles into mediocre gossip

Scandals in the Highest Office by Hope Ridings Miller
Random House, $7.95

Scandals in the Highest Office, is a mediocre gossip column bordering on slobbering idiosyncrasy. Presidents are certainly important enough to investigate, but it seems Miller finds it more "delicious" to talk about Mrs. Lincoln's expensive wardrobe, or the wallpaper hung in the renovated White House during one president's administration.

There is a perverse occupation with adulterous presidents, their subsequent illegitimate progeny and which Washington socialite gave the best dinner party while in or out of office. The fact is, the book is a grand bore. It brings back memories of those trivia games we played during those especially boring English classes.

Did you know for Instance that President Arthur (who? what?) ordered "25 suits from the best tailor in New York City" for his inauguration. Another amazing and shattering fact is that President Buchanan remained unmarried because of a broken heart: apparently his fiancée who was third cousin... (yawn) funeral... letter returned unopened. She committed suicide. The jacket cover proves to be more tease than please: "Was G. Washington literally the father of his country?" "Was J.F.K. secretly married a first time to Durie (Kerr) Malcolm?" I still don't know. I defer from making suggestions but my candid opinion is that you would better spend your money on Readers Digest or bubble gum.

Author takes a new peek at the Riel rebellions

The Temptations of Big Bear
by Rudy Wiebe
McClelland and Stewart, $8.95

The Temptations of Big Bear deals with events of the decade preceding the second Riel uprising in 1885. It's a historical novel and, though people and places are real, the author cautions that "all characters in this meditation upon the past are the products of a particular imagination."

As such the book may be examined from two approaches. First, the historical aspect - providing the book's chief interest as well as its one drawback. Second, the cultural aspect - in which an ethnic group is described by an outsider.

To quickly overview the book's setting, settlement of Canada's West can be divided into three phases - pre-1812, 1812-1870 and 1870-1885. Until 1812 there was essentially no white settlement of the prairies. The Indians and Metis led their unrestricted nomadic lives. First threat to this freedom came with the Red River settlement in 1812. Over the next 50 years subsequent encroachment and depletion of the buffalo left the Metis two alternatives: to retreat further west or to stand and resist the eastern advance. The latter stance, led by Riel, had sufficient force to cause the new Confederation to organize the region as Manitoba in 1870.

In 1870-1885 the stage was thus set with the Metis and Indians pushed west now to Saskatchewan. This is where the novel focuses, specifically on Big Bear, one of the Plains Cree chiefs.

Following 1870, most of the Indians signed treaties acquiescing to Canadian policy. However, a handful including Big Bear resisted all offers. Concurrently Metis, driven from Manitoba, established settlements around Batchoe. With no title to their farms they sought legal recognition from the Canadian government through petitions. When these drew no response they considered a more militant approach. To this end Riel was summoned from Montana.

Riel envisaged a new confederacy of Metis and Indians but received little direct help from the Indians. Some of Big Bear's tribe lent the Metis support but the chief himself was never really committed. Ultimately the Metis were defeated at Batchoe in 1885.

With the Metis quelled, full attention was turned to finally subduing the few remaining Indians. The book ends with Big Bear's sentencing and release in 1888.

The above outline is part in reaction to the book's major drawback: unless you're up on your Canadian history it's easy to get lost. However it's precisely the subject matter that provides chief interest and anyone with a taste for Canadian history would enjoy the book.

Wiebe complements narrative passages with liberal use of contemporary diary, newspaper and courtroom sources. Among these appear portions from the diary of Francis (son of Charles)

Big Bear

Dickens, then an inspector with the recently established North West Mounted Police.

Much of the action lies in a 200 mile strip of the North Saskatchewan River from Batchoe to Fort Pitt. Even today the old atmosphere can be sensed in a leisurely drive from Saskatoon to Edmonton following the river valley. Many of the events of the book are reconstructed and preserved along the route at such places as the National Historic Parks at Batchoe and Battleford.

Whereas the historical references are familiar, the novel's perspective of them is different. Using the Indian viewpoint, commonly stressed components become secondary. Such things as early Canadian politics and Metis affairs are reduced to background incidents.

Despite this, Wiebe makes little attempt to define or evaluate Big Bear's philosophy. Big Bear comes through as just wanting to maintain the old nomadic life and avoid trouble. To do this he simply refuses to sign treaties or condone violent raids by his more aggressive warriors. He never tries to argue or justify his actions.

Wiebe's objective approach to the characterization is commendable. Too often white men describing other cultures produce monsters. Fred Bodsworth somehow won a Governor General's award in 1967 for The Sparrow's Fall. It's one of those novels where by the last chapter you're futilely hoping that the rebellious brave and his petite, but grossly cackethic squaw will be devoured by a rabid moose. Similarly, in 1971 James Houston wrote The White Dawn which must have any self-respecting Eskimo blush to his mukluks. In contrast, last year Harold Ladoo wrote No Pain Like This Body. This depicts his East-Indian forebears, recently arrived in the West Indies. The people are real and believable. Likewise Wiebe, by avoiding excess, draws Indian, Metis and White that are genuine.

Rudy Wiebe was born in Saskatchewan in 1934. He presently teaches English at the University of Alberta. His novel, relying heavily on historical content, will lack the more universal appeal of classic fiction. Yet for this very reason, The Temptations of Big Bear is a praiseworthy contribution to Canadian literature.

Over the brink of time

Closing Time is an attempt to put two books on top of each other than they might become sexual. In some respects Brown's method works, and we are exposed to a very real, and enjoyable, intercourse between the James Joyce of Finnegans Wake and the Giambattista Vico of the New Science. However there are problems with Brown's interpretation of Joyce which leave one in doubt as to the importance of Brown's book. Closing Time is the product of Brown's own fertile imagination despite the fact that it is composed largely of quotes from Joyce and Vico; at no time are we left in any doubt as to Brown's purpose. He is trying to impress on us that we are at a time in history when we are able to transcend history, transcend tragedy, and to transcend the genital organization of the body politic. "It is just, it is just about to, it is just about to rolywholyover."

Brown's point of departure is solution to the problem of aggression in society, instinctual reconciliation as a basis for a non-repressive society was Brown's solution, as opposed to Marcuse's contention that the problem of aggression would be solved with Eros triumphing over Thanatos in the instinctual struggle for domination. Brown further explicated his thesis in Love's Body. Liberation from a repressive society will not come in a political or economic revolution; politics is symbolic, everything is symbolic, everything including the sexual act. But symbolic of what? A careful reading of Brown shows that this is not a valid question. What we call reality, Brown calls illusion, deception. Everything is symbolic, "that seeing they might see and not perceive." Realization of what "reality" is symbolic of, is the making conscious of the unconscious; Freud's mission. "A secret disclosed; a veil to be rent, a seal to be broke open." In Clos- creative.

For Vico, the language of a particular people contains the wisdom of the race which created it. A knowledge of the language and its modifications over time provides a knowledge of the history of the people using it, for language can only be the total stock of ideas to which a people has progressed. Joyce realized this as well. In a letter to Harriet Shaw Weaver, he wrote, "I would not pay over-much attention to these theories (Vico's and Bruno's) beyond using them for all they are worth."

Brown has used Joyce badly. He suggests that Finnegans Wake is about smashing the atom, or etym, and that it represents the annihilation of language so that it can be annihilated again; created out of nothing. As in Love's Body, the aim is words with nothing to them; empty words, corresponding to the void in things. But as Kenner has suggested, Joyce only sought to empty words of their instantaneous meaning, he was not in quest of dadaist unmeaning.

Joyce, himself, provides the clue to an understanding of Finnegans Wake. "Triv and quad are the keys to dreamland. As you sing it; it's a study... This non-day diary, this allnight's newsy reel." But Brown is quite unable to see Joyce and Vico as parts of a tradition, as grammarians. As McLuhan perceived twenty years ago, Joyce is very much concerned with the tradition in which Vico was writing; that of the medieval trivium and quadrivium. Joyce had studied the trivium and at the time of his writing there was a renewed interest in the traditional arts of communication. Just as Vico had suggested that language was the sum of man's knowledge, so too Joyce pictured Finnegans Wake as an "all night news reel" in which the whole of the collective unconscious of mankind would be revealed as past and present intertwined; one world burrowing on another. Vico was attempting to resuscitate the classical rhetoric of Quintilian, as a New Science opposed to the rational metaphysics of Descartes. If Brown appreciated this, he would see that the aim of Finnegans Wake is not words with nothing to them, but rather an attempt to put more meaning into words.

According to Brown, the final pages of Finnegans Wake represent literature at the breaking point, the language of Joyce is the language of a civilization in decline, and farce is the mode of consciousness in which a people take leave of their history. But Finnegans Wake is not that mode of consciousness and the prescription for our culture is not to sit back and wait for the end, as Brown suggests.

As in Blake, the revolution, the revelation, the apocalypse, is vision; which pronounces a last judgement; and brings about the end. But also as in Marcuse, unless the analysis takes the road of return from the symbolic literal it remains ideology replacing one mystification another. On the verge of time? Perhaps not, but it is a interesting idea.

Vico's cycle of world ages; the age of divinity, the age of heroes and the age of men. Revolution - a revolving cycle of decline - first gods, then heroes, then men; process as profanation. For Joyce, history is the nightmare from which he is trying to awake. For Brown, "That's where it's at: decline." Civilization is founded on the disclosure of a mystery. This mystery keeps unfolding throughout the course of history, until there is no mystery left. At that time new mysteries must be discovered in order to renew civilization. We are in such a time, Brown tells us, new mysteries must be discovered by the power of the imagination, "the power which makes poets the unacknowledged legislators of mankind, the power which makes all things new."

We will remember Brown as the author of Life Against Death, in which he proposed an attitudinal revolution to death as a ing Time, we are told that this is the task of the poetic imagination.

For Brown, as for Vico, in history man makes himself. This is Vico's reversal of rational metaphysics; man becomes all things by not understanding them. In not understanding, man uses his imagination to create things out of his own sensory experience and then becomes them, by forming his world to accommodate them. "It's all a misunderstanding," Brown tells us, "a creative misunderstanding." Vico came to his conclusions by considering primitive man, whose first experiences were sensory. These men had to create their own world using their impressions of those sensations. They were thus poets, which is Greek for creators. Reason or intellect only came into play after the imagination had generalized the impressions of sensations. Man is not, then, essentially rational, rather, he is essentially

Breathing fire

Annals of the Firebreather
by Marcel Horne
Peter Martin Associates, $8.95

"I have always been a dramatic mother-fucker", says Marcel Horne.

It's the truth. From his career as a youthful "town asshole" in Leamington Ontario, to his trips criss-crossing the continent with endless carnivals, to his spells in jail, to his finding - or losing - himself in his fierce obsession with the gypsy art of fire-breathing, the hero - or is it anti-hero? - of Annals of the Firebreather does nothing in half-measures. Like a lumpen-Ulysses, he is driven by some nameless compulsion to live his life as hard, and as fully, as he can.

A dramatic mother-fucker. Car theft and armed robbery at seventeen. Hitching to western Canada - "somewhere" - with 25 cents in his pocket. Stealing food. Working with carnivals: "drinking, fighting, and fucking." Face and mouth forever scorched as he learned to breathe fire.

Hooked on speed. Making a religion out of his fire-breathing. And having a son.

It was for the son that he decided to record his experiences - and they're far from over yet, it seems - in this autobiography. A writer friend persuaded him to have it published. The result is a good yarn, but it's more than that too: a remarkably compelling piece of writing. And starkly honest. Every word of it may not be the literal truth, but true it is, nonetheless. That much you can tell.

Starting out as a kid who saw it differently from most. And made choices different than most of us make.

Watching people you grew up with slaving in the fields all day and having nothing. You live for the finance company and the bank and you eat scraps like a dog to save money that goes into banks. And then you die.

"What in the hell have you lived for? What do you have in life? A six quart basket of tomatoes and a mortgage.

"And the rich get richer. "No man, this is not for me. I want to grow up and be human. Are there any left?"

"Someday wherever I go, when people hear my name - they'll know who I am. I promise myself."

Marcel Horne's instincts are the kind that let him survive disasters, not the kind that would enable him to avoid them. His is the kind of life most of us will prefer to read about rather than lead. But we may feel just a bit guilty about it when we speculate, uncomfortably, about the things we're missing.

What the hell. It's a good book. Read it.

Season's Greetings from Simco

Hall's 'One Big Happy Family'

The Donnellys sets new standards for Canadian drama

Tarragon Theatre's production of James Reaney's play Sticks and Stones: The Donnellys Part One is probably the most important theatrical production of this season. Although not totally successful — Act 1 seems overlong and sometimes confusing even on second viewing — the innovative techniques which shape and define the play represent the best of Canadian stagecraft. Its collective synthesis of impressions, the quick shifts in time and locale, and the method of representing large events or issues through a reduction to particular symbols, sounds, or gestures, require careful attention. We are following not a traditional story narrative but a mosaic of images, not a single but a multiple viewpoint. And what we have before us in this production is a fusion of the imagination and vitality of many people. Reaney has been researching and organizing the events leading up to the violent murder of the Donnelly family in 1893 for many years. Using the material, workshop groups at the Neptune Theatre, Halifax, evolved into shape over the summer. And finally director Keith Turnbull has pulled and compressed the play into its present form.

Our first impression of the Sticks and Stones world of the Donnelly family is the blackboard graffiti walls which surround them. Written on the walls are the rhymes, crude invectives, dates and pictures important to this part of their story (The whole is still a trilogy in the making). In the first sequence of the play, placing the Donnellys in Biddulph township of western Ontario, we learn of the curse which has followed them from Ireland — the name Blackfoot. The following sequence flashes back to the Irish Whitefoot — Blackfoot feud in which all those who refused to join the Secret Society retaliation against the English landowners were labelled Blackfoot. The sounds are horses' hooves in the night and sticks cracking together, the images a burning house and physical violence. But we also learn that the accusatory label is synonymous with heretic, scab, nigger, leper, or any of the names which break and separate people belying the jingle "sticks and stones may break my bones but words will never hurt me".

From this initial introduction to the central antagonism between the Donnellys and their neighbours, the play fragments into the other issues and events which ricochet off the first one: the competition for the land, the division of the land by unscrupulous surveyors, the buying and selling of the land, the keeping of the land. These are the pressures moulding the character of early settlers in a new world, pressures compounded in this case by the religious splits between Protestant and Catholic, the political splits between Grit and Tory, the social splits between those who accumulated rapid wealth and those who remained without, the personal splits between one family and their neighbours. As one of the images defines the situation, it is a cat's cradle of complexity. And perhaps at times this is where the play loses us. The sheer accumulation of detail cannot be absorbed as rapidly as the quick pace of the play's style dictates. Nor are we taken away from the particular to a wider focus on what this all means today. It is as if a camera eye continually zooms in without ever zooming out again.

Acts II and III seem simpler perhaps because an emotional understanding of the Donnelly family, seen from inside, is given emphasis. The issues are more straight-forward. They are the clear-cut ones of pride, love and courage rather than the mire of prejudice, hatred, jealousy and vindictiveness. Mrs. Donnelly collects petitions and treks long miles to the city, demanding clemency for her condemned husband, a baby girl is born after many boys, husband and wife are re-united after a seven year jail sentence, Jim Donnelly's barn is burned down in 1867 but he decides to stay on his land. And finally in the last moment of the play Jenny Donnelly (the only daughter) shares her premonition of the violent end of the family.

The tensions of the play come from the separation and synthesis of images, the pulling apart and coming together of the dramatic action, the mixture of poetry and the colloquial rendition of immediate experience within the framework of historical documentation. These were real people. These things really happened. But at the same time Reaney plays with the chameleon-like nature of myth and reality, fantasy and truth. At one point a travelling showman has his troupe act out the murder committed by Jim Donnelly. But Donnelly himself interrupts and his version is acted out. The two viewpoints mix and draw apart like quicksilver.

It is not an easy play but yet easy specific things emerge from the conglomerate of words and impressions which define the experience of these people. Sticks, stones, ladders and wheels. But they are also weapons, tools, roads and symbols of house-building, land-breaking and the inevitable turn of events. The clothesline of shirts represents the Donnelly family. But so does each member of the cast. The people are priests, tavern keepers and farmers. They are also murderers.

The cast of Sticks and Stones play many parts. Their individual definitions merge in chants, simultaneous speech and role exchange. Even so, like the reverberations of the sounds in the play, some ring longer than others: David Ferry as Will Donnelly, Carol Lazare as Jenny Donnelly, Jerry Franken as Mr. Donnelly and Patricia Ludwick as Mrs. Donnelly. Set against them are the clip of horses' hooves, the crack of sticks and the dull thud of stones. These sounds seem to continue after the actors fall silent. This is Sticks and Stones: The Donnellys Part One.

Twice is too often for Once in a Lifetime

This month the Firehall Theatre is presenting a revival of the George S. Kaufman-Moss Hart show, Once in a Lifetime. The play was undoubtedly funny when originally produced but has lost a good deal of the initial humour in the current adaptation directed by Phyllis Benvenuto. *

The script deals with the birth of the "talkies" in the twenties and their revolutionary effect on Broadway and Hollywood personalities, a subject which could indeed be the stuff of great drama or comedy. Once in a Lifetime stands shakily between both, never successfully achieving either.

The show centers around three vaudevillians, May, George and Jerry, who sell their act and join the trek to Hollywood. They are inspired with the idea of opening a school of elocution to teach the stars how to speak in talking films. They are hired by Herman Glogauer, giant film magnate, alternating between success and failure not through any particular talent or lack of it. George the deadpan of the act and of the whole show has been content with a third rate existence on the vaudeville circuit. He now finds himself king of the Glogauer studios, symbol of the vast bureaucracy and incompetence of Hollywood. He makes wrong movies, orders 2,000 airplanes and generally blunders about. He is of course hailed the new genius of films.

The unsubtle treatment of characters is perhaps the greatest defect in the show. With the exception of one or two supporting actresses every one of the women is hysterical. Susan Walker, a star-struck girl from Columbus Ohio, is perhaps the most blatant example of this hysteria. Though Susan is an obviously flighty character, Marita Ensio never once stops fluttering her eyes and bobbing about wildly. Sandra Shuman takes second prize for lack of subtlety in the role of Helen Hobart, the famous movie columnist. Everyone knows movie columnists are loud and obnoxious, but Shuman is just too loud. Beverlee Miller's rather harsh voice and unfortunate lack of timing render her unsuitable in the part of May as a teacher of elocution and a character capable of any tenderness.

The men are not such horren-

Woody Allen stumbles again

Don't Drink the Water, a Woody Allen comedy playing at the Colonnade Theatre, though pleasantly humorous, is at times reminiscent of the American TV serial "Love American Style".

The scene is an American Embassy in "a small communist country". The ambassador, a deep-voiced well-dressed man leaves the country and relegates his power to his son Axel (who is by the way an elongated version of Woody Allen). Axel is of course incompetent, unpleasant to look at and a complete failure with women. This stereotype which frequently appears in Allen's comedies is apparently modelled after the creator himself who seems bound to capitalize on his personal insecurity.

Immediately after the ambassador's departure a great crisis besets the embassy. A family of Jewish American tourists seek asylum when they are accused by the communists of being spies. The family is forced to extend their vacation and remain within the confines of the embassy for two months and it is their experiences during this time which form the play. A protected priest with "another hobby besides God" does magic tricks, Axel and the beautiful daughter participate in a love affair of sorts, and the father bemoans his ill-fated expenditure of $3,500 "for three weeks of uninterrupted diarrhea" (hence the title).

Decidedly Jack Zimmerman, who plays the father and caterer from New Jersey, steals the show. Any defects in plot or staging seem to disappear the moment he steps on stage. He exhibits great control over the audience often creating uproarious laughter.

Unfortunately the rest of the cast, with the exception of Ellen Balkan as the perfect Jewish housewife, was not quite so successful. Tim Fort, the Woody Allen character was fell and fumbled too often with little finesse or presence, and Virginia Reh the Bohemian daughter failed to be anything but very sweet. Steve Geras who plays the priest with the magic act is like the other supporting actors, passable but not particularly exciting.

Though banal in plot, Don't Drink the Water is entertaining and worth seeing if only to enjoy Fred Zimmerman's antics.

cynthia mcCarthy

dous stereotypes as the women. Jerry, played by Ted Brock, has a tendency to blend into the set, and Glenn Gilmar as George does nothing more offensive than smile a great deal.

Costuming and set direction is certainly interesting (especially a 1928 Mitchell movie camera) making Once in a Lifetime a pleasurable visual experience. However the most enjoyable part of the evening is the music between acts, a charming selection of old Jolson and Durante tunes.

Reason for revival of this play should definitely be questioned. Though movie lore is very important to modern audiences the Kaufman Hart play is dated and too long.

Tim Buckley feels like a different man since he got his new gas-mask.

Tim Buckley passes from sensitive adolescence through frantic jazz to restrained Sefronia

Sefronia
Tim Buckley
Discreet Records (WEA); $6.29

Tim Buckley's face stares quizzically from the cover of his newest album, Sefronia, as if to ask, "Where am I at now?"

Seven years ago, Buckley was, according to his liner notes, "an incredibly thin wire, just 19 years old, a kind of quintessence of nouvelle." Yet on Sefronia, we find the erstwhile sensitive adolescent assuming the viewpoint of a middle-aged man reflecting on an old love, Martha.

When he started out, Buckley was a refined sensibility who sang in a high voice of 'Stony people walkin' round in Christian licorice clothes.' But even then, the essentially folk basis of his music was overlaid with other elements. After Goodbye and Hello, his second album, he made four records which increasingly tended toward jazz. Happy Sad, Blue Afternoon, Lorca, culminating in Starsailor, which received a five-star rating from Downbeat magazine. As his voice deepened, he began to use its wide range, learning from jazz vocalists, like Leon Thomas, to sing non-verbally. On Starsailor, for example, he does a fair imitation of a baboon in heat ('Monterey'). His choice of instruments was jazz — influenced as well — acoustic bass, vibes, congas, and the guitar of Lee Underwood; no drums.

Then, in 1970, after Starsailor, Buckley lost Underwood, who had been with him since the beginning. Buckley was not heard from for over two years, until last winter, and 'Letter From L.A.'

With 'Letter From L.A.', Tim Buckley's style changed once more, toward rock. Sefronia is closer to that album in many ways than to anything before. On both of these albums, Buckley seems to be making an effort to be more accessible. He brings back the drums, and adds female background vocalists. The replacement for Underwood is Joe Falsa, a competent rock guitarist (Underwood was much closer to jazz). Without Underwood's guitar more emphasis is placed on keyboards.

On Sefronia, none of the songs are over four and half minutes long, which is unusual. (On Lorca, the average length was eight minutes.) For the first time, in his career Buckley uses other people's material — four songs in all. These include the first cut on the album, Fred Neil's "Dolphins", in an arrangement quite similar to the original (Underwood pays a visit on this track), "Martha", "I Know I'd Recognize Your Face", sung with Marcia Waldorf, (the weakest cut on the album), and "Peanut Man". Buckley's uninhibited personality comes through so strongly in everything he does, that the major fault in three of the four cases is that, good or bad songs, they aren't him.

The other seven songs are Buckley originals, two written with Larry Beckett, with whom he has collaborated periodically since the days of the first album. Many of these have a Latin feel to them, like "Stone In Love", and "Quicksand".

'Letter From L.A.' included several parodies of Buckley's own eroticism, which had been getting more and more overblown, from Lorca on. One song, "Make It Right", goes: I want you to beat me, whip me, spank me, Oh, make it right again.

On Sefronia, he is more restrained, though he manages to make the Jaynetts "Sally Go Round the Roses" into a chapter in his child's garden of the perverse:

Sally don't you go down, don't you go down Saddest thing in the whole wide world is to see your baby with another girl

In general, Tim Buckley achieves with Sefronia a mellowness which was lacking on 'Letter From L.A.', parts of which bothered me as being too frantic — both the lyrics and the music. This new album is worth placing beside the best of his earlier recordings. The highlights are two extremely beautiful compositions, "Because of You", and the two-part title piece.

A testimonial: When singing in the bathtub, I try to imitate Tim Buckley.

"We're looking for guys who..."

"We're looking for guys who are creative, have a vision of what's needed in this world — stand by their vision in the face of opposition, misunderstanding — But not a selfish vision — doing things for their own glory but working to change a society that's messed up. The Scarboro Fathers offer one road of bringing this about — a power thing — transforming attitudes."

This has been my experience as a Scarboro Foreign Missionary in the Philippines — I learned the Church has the power to do things — not just baptizing, blessing in the old sense — but the dynamics of working with small groups of people who learn to work for themselves — come into their own — become involved — a coming alive.

I don't know if you're creative, or got a vision — but if you aren't content with what you see — and want to do something with your life and the world... maybe your vision is awakening.

Let's talk about it. Maybe the Scarboro Fathers can help you find your vision."

Lyrics vary little as Slade slams out loud, fast rock

Sladest
Slade
Polydor; $6.29

Sladest is the new release by Slade, a quartet from Wolverhampton, England, which began its career as just another loud, skin-head band and has over the past three years evolved into one of the best glitter-rock groups in England. Unfortunately their success has not spread into the Canadian and American markets; Sladest can be explained as an attempt to get airplay and correct the situation.

There are 14 cuts on the record, a mixture of old and new material, allowing the listener to follow the group's musical development from 1970 to the present. Seven compositions have been included in their previous albums, among them "Gudby I Jane", "Look at last nite" and "Mama wear all crazee now". The rest is made up of hits never released in Canada, flip-sides and a couple of brand new songs. The only problem is that some of the older material doesn't fit the newer releases.

The powerhouse singing of Noddy Holder and the foot stomping rhythm of Don Powell's drums are the best and most identifiable features of Slade. Lead guitarist Dave Hill and bassist Jimmy Lea provide not only vocal backing for Holder, but a tightly controlled bass sound on most of the songs. Slade concentrates on loud, fast, foot stomping tunes with short verses and chorus repetitions that build up in intensity punctuated by Powell's shotgunlike drumming. It words so well that it has been used in various forms on many of their biggest hits without being boring or seeming repetitious.

The LP opens with "Take me back 'ome", a hit all over Europe last summer, which for some strange reason was never released in Canada. A perfect example of good rock, it has simple lyrics coupled with a fast and pounding beat driven along by Holder singing at his best. On "Coz I luv you" Holder gets a rare chance to sing a fast but very gentle song and allows bassist Lea to carry the tune with some interesting and very controlled playing. The mood is further intensified by a beautiful, but anonymous, violin that haunts the background.

The next side opens with the frantic "Cum feel the Noize", an almost autobiographic song about a band described as being out of tune, loud, ugly but one that still makes money. The singer offers no explanation, in fact he doesn't know why, but he invites the listener to join in and just enjoy himself. This song itself seems to explain the popularity of the group in Europe where most of the discotheques feature dancing to records rather than live groups. Slade's style fits into this pattern and of course provides the group, especially where air play is limited—as in England—with much needed exposure.

Bassist Lea gets another chance to shine through on "Look wot you done", where he not only matches the rhythm of the tune but keeps up with Holders' singing without swamping or overpowering the rest of the band. The unusual honky-tonk piano backing gives the tune some depth and bottom while providing the back-up vocals with support as the tempo increases.

There are a couple of obvious clunkers on this record; most of them happen to be written by non-members of Slade. That brings up the question of whether the band is capable of handling its own material only because it fits a particular pattern, or because it is worth recording. The two biggest losers on this LP are "Wild winds are blowing" a pretentious song made up of pretty lame lyrics, which only serves to irritate the listener as the band screeches through it, and an obnoxious tune called "Skweeze me, pleeze me". The inclusion of both songs on one album (although the latter was the group's biggest hit) leaves this listener with a bad impression of both the group and public taste. But it doesn't mean the whole record is a loss.

few verses of meaningless, often unintelligible lyrics which are followed by an instrumental section and a closing fadeout. The pattern remains the same throughout the album.

In one or two places the music almost gets off the ground. "Shelk", a desert ballad begins well enough with a lively piercing guitar balanced well within the bass and drums. But the lack of imagination and inability to deviate from the most basic structures thwarts all growth of the song. This is typical. The music goes nowhere, it simply repeats, goes through the limited changes allowed it, repeats some more and ends. Texas obviously has a long way to go in building musical traditions worthy of the adjective, fine.

Angel anthology is a good buy for the neophyte

Angel Album: Best of 20 Years
Angel

I pity whoever had to pick the selections that make up this set. When you've got a catalogue as wide-ranging and excellent as Angel possesses, it's a really tough set of decisions to have to make: what to leave out?

Side 1 features "The Early Years" when Angel pioneered the cellophane-sealed package (the usual practice was to keep them open so that prospective customers could audition new releases. Angel started sealing the discs and relied on their reputation to sell the product. It worked.) One of the top-selling artists the label ever had was Dennis Brain, a phenomenally gifted horn player, whose definitive recording of the four Mozart horn concertos is still a best seller, even in its original mono. Appropriately, he leads off the side with the Rondo movement from the fourth concerto. Other early artists featured are Dinu Lipatti, Claudio Arrau, Walter Gieseking, and a host of others.

The rest of the two-record set is devoted to The Great Instrumentalists, Conductors and Singers. The roster of artists, is without exaggeration one of the finest ever assembled in one set. And the music is a near-perfect choice for someone beginning a collection. You may be new to opera, but after hearing such luminaries as Franco Corelli, Janet Baker, Maria Callas, Beverly Sills, Nicolai Gedda and others perform the most popular arias in the repertoire ("Celeste Aida, the Quarter from "Fidelio", and so on.) you'll be a fan for good.

Packaged in fancy silver wrapping, it includes an illustrated catalogue of the whole Angel range. I can't praise this set enough. The selection of music is as good as I've ever heard from a "Greatest Hits" album (which this essentially is) and the performances are top-notch. If you've ever given any thought to classical music, get this set. I don't know just what the stores will be selling it for, but my copy had a "special price" sticker on the front, indicating something in the $6 to $8 buck class. With Xmas on the way, sales are bound to be good for this item, so get it while you can. Ten stars.

"In the fine Texas tradition" is how the jacket describes the album Tres Hombres by Z Z Top, a three man band from that great state of the union. Neil Young fades away with a sloppy album

Time Fades Away
Neil Young
Reprise (WEA); $6.29
Let's get one thing straight. I like Neil Young.

But it seems that Young is doing all he possibly can to destroy the respect he's earned in my eyes over the last few years. One can always overlook a bad concert, after the initial shock of it. But bad recordings are inexcusable.

And Young has just put out his second "bad" album in a row. "Journey Through The Past" was the pathetic excuse for a new record that Young presented his loyal following exactly a year ago. The movie has received so much criticism that it has yet to reach this city.

The latest LP, Time Fades Away will most certainly deal a crushing blow to all but the least discerning Young fans.

Time Fades Away is a "live" LP containing 8 cuts, each recorded at a different location during Young's last concert tour. It's discouraging to have to accept the actuality that these tracks were the best of those 8 concerts.

The band is essentially the same one that accompanied Young at his concert at Maple Leaf Gardens; Ben Keith on steel guitar, Tim Drummond on bass, Jack Nitzsche on piano and Johnny Barbata (of Jefferson Airplane) on drums. Kenny Buttray played drums at the Gardens.

There isn't any of the excitement of a live concert here. There's no talking between the cuts just the fading applause of one audience and on to the next tune. There's none of the continuity of the Young performance left either. His concerts are much closer to the style represented on "Four Way Steet"; an acoustic set is followed by the introduction of the band and an electric rock set. Instead, the album features the quieter material thrown in between the more raucous songs.

But the main defect in "Time Fades Away" is pure and simple sloppiness, in singing and playing. Most of the offending songs originate in the loud rock songs like "Time Fades Away", "Yonder Stands The Sinner", "Last Dance" and "Don't Be Denied". All are excellent examples of what happens when a band loses control. Young too often aims for notes beyond the capability of his vocal chords and the results are the hoarse shrieking vocals. Ben Keith doesn't help any either. He should give up singing. His attempted harmony inevitably drags Young along the same out of tune route. This must be a cruel joke.

Three of the eight compositions deal with Young's past and consequently refer to Canada. At least two, "Time Fades Away", and "Don't Be Denied" strike a bit deep at father Scott Young.

But the ballad, "Journey Through The Past", which Young has sung for several years but never before recorded, is probably the best song. The melody comes right out of the After The Goldrush era. Too bad about the flubbed note on the piano. When he sang this one at the Gardens there was a great cheer after the line "Well I'm going back to Canada..." There's only silence on the record.

In the end you're left with ringing ears denied aesthetics and the mocking statement on the label that, "this recording was mastered 16-track direct to disc by computer".

Brewed from pure spring water.

And that's the truth!

A good thriller is something a movie does vastly better than a book or a play, and many of the greatest movies have used thriller-like plots or incorporated elements of suspense and the gothic into their stories. Citizen Kane, much of Antonian Antonioni and Bergman, and dozens of silent films are notable for their eeriness. But pure thriller material, in film no less than literature, is considered the task of a technician, not an artist which is why Hitchcock, Polanski, Chabrol and others will never be the Chekhovs or George Eliots of cinema. Some ambitious but overconfident directors have tried to get the best of both worlds by making thrillers then making fun of them by spoofing their material. Robert Altman's latest film (which had box-office troubles and was withdrawn) was finally reissued with a silly new ad campaign billing it as a wild send-up of gumshoe movies. The rationale behind this is that you can sell anything, good, bad or indifferent, to people who love to be clued in on a joke.

Nothing so simple-minded as a spoof, The Long Goodbye is stunning. It succeeds on its thriller level, and it's an exciting movie, but the excitement comes from its style and iconoclasm, not from artificially added jolts. Of recent films, only Cabaret worked on the same edgy, nervous energy and generated the same kind of riveting ambiguity staying with its style and iconoclasm, not from artificially added jolts. Of recent films, only Cabaret worked on the same edgy, nervous energy and generated the same kind of riveting ambiguity staying with its style and iconoclasm, not from artificially added jolts.

Goodbye's genre, again, is the private eye story. Its species is corruption, Southern California style. Raymond Chandler, along with Dashiell Hammett, James Cain and now Ross MacDonal, is one of the foremost chroniclers of this sub-tropical rottenness. The best thrillers from the forties, like Double Indemnity, The Maltese Falcon and The Big Sleep came out of this school, the products of an almost incestuous collaboration. The hard-boiled Los Angeles crime novel was influenced by the upstart cinema to begin with — the vivid details, the impossibly bright stichomythia — and the books were plundered for more movies. Of the authors mentioned, Chandler was weakest on plot (sometimes writing himself into an inextricable tangle of subplots) but he did his atmosphere up to the hilt. His milieu was a hothouse where perversity thrived and took on an exotic, repulsive bloom.

Altman has taken over the hothouse and turned the thermostat all the way up. The Long Goodbye has the look of jungle running mutant-wild before strangling itself. It's such an unnatural world that we can't get our bearings, and can't say whether it's beautiful or terrifying.

The casting throughout is inspired. Altman chose his actors not so much for what they could do but for their off-camera reputations which matched his character. Nina van Pallandt (the Clifford Irving adventuress) as the scheming woman; sports celebrity Jim Bouton as a pretty-boy playboy without much sense of consequences; or Henry Gibson, the mild little poetaster from Laugh-in, as Dr. Verringer (here Altman turns Gibson's milquetoast image inside-out by making him the most menacing character in the film).

Elliot Gould plays Philip Marlowe, a role that was once Bogart's, but now only the dangling cigarette stub remains. I have so little use for Gould that I've long wished for a constitutional amendment barring him from movies, but on the evidence of *M*A*S*H* and Goodbye I'd tack on a rider stipulating "unless directed by Robert Altman." A matter of fact I can't imagine anybody who could have brought off the role and the movie as well as Gould has done.

From the outset it's obvious that this Marlowe doesn't have the stuff of a Bogart. He's such an innocent he can't even deceive his own orange tabby, admittedly, a very brainy cat. (The cat seems to occupy a position in his life much like the proverbial cats that elderly maiden aunts dote upon, for there is no trace of a woman or for that matter a man in Marlowe's life; he doesn't even flirt). Unkempt, shambling Marlowe is cajoled into driving a friend, one night at three am, down to Tijuana. As a result he finds himself in trouble both with the police and with a Vegas-style showbiz gangster Marty Augustine. He also hears that his friend supposedly killed his wife and subsequently, in Mexico, killed himself. Marlowe doesn't believe it, but before he knows it he's hired for another case. A well-heeled blonde played by van Pallandt hires him to find her alcoholic writer-husband who's disappeared on a monumental binge. (Sterling Hayden's part as this Hemingway-style drunk is enough reason in itself to see the movie; I've never seen him better).

As should surprise no one familiar with Chandler's world, all these incidents begin to congeal into a clever, despicable plot which nobody but Marlowe has motivation to solve. But instead of going through a gauntlet of beatings, shootings and abruptly cancelled assignments, this Marlowe emerges relatively unscathed. Throughout the movie, Altman feeds us enough farce to make us settle back for a sort of whodunit *M*A*S*H*, only to wheel around and startle us. Marlowe's brushes with Marty Augustine have a dizzy unreality that skitters along the brink of slapstick. Only once, and quick as a greaselfire, do they flare into ugliness, and the action is so intense and unexpected it takes your breath away.

All the way through Altman keeps it up, pushing things to the edge. Little Henry Gibson, as Dr. Verringer, is ludicrous when he leaps through the grass and mingles with the loonies at his private sanatorium for extortion, but he remains frightening too, as when he slaps a man twice his size into submission.

What makes The Long Goodbye so remarkable is that this two-edged approach goes all the way. Altman guys the excess and grotesqueries of Chandler's genre without sapping their power to catch our imagination. Nor does he beg off after teasing us for most of the ride; he maintains his unique view to the last frame of the film, a major departure from Chandler's book. Marlowe's way of resolving the mess that's ensnared him is as simple and brutal as Alexander's unravelling of the Gordian knot. It leaves the audience in nervous silence, and when in a daredevil coda Gould-Marlowe lopes off down a dusty road in Mexico, a version of "Hooray for Hollywood", full of tinny exuberance, is his recessional. Who but Altman is brazen enough to try such a stunt and enough in control to bring it off? That scratchy old hymn to America's dream machine underscores Altman's point, that movies have warped a lot of lives by overfeeding fantasies that were better kept hungry. (Every character in the story owes something of his styles and credo to Hollywood's alluring visions of romance and class and the good life bought on the cheap.) That sounds like a killjoy's dreary theory, and otherwise might be. But Altman has managed to set that idea in a movie that shares all the panache of a forties thriller and a seventies comedy with the exquisite sensibilities of an artist. For all the talent he showed in

*M*A*S*H* and particularly in the touching, evanescent McCabe & Mrs. Miller, he was only one of our interesting young directors. With early superstars like Kubrick and Fellini and Peckinpah showing their coarseness as they age, and even Truffaut content to put out thin, whimsical confections under his name, Altman shows his staying power and, even with some resounding flops, his firm yer delicate control. This movie puts him within reach of the claim to being one of the great intuitive artists of the cinema as well as one of its master entertainers and that combination is as rare in movies as it is in literature. Another movie as satisfying and memorable as The Long Goodbye will clinch it for him. Another movie this good won't be around for quite a while, it's safe to bet. Five people I know of hitherto irreconcilably divergent tastes all found this a first-rate film. If you care about movies, forget about the nit-picking nitwits who review for the dailies (their different styles of nitwittiness are not worth distinctions); don't let The Long Goodbye slip out of town a failure, or even a moderate success.

Don't let giving set you down

Like a creeping thing from the planet Zo-Ga, Xmas is upon us again, and even diehard atheists, marxists and Scrooges get a bit of the ol' holiday spirit(s) and make the move to shower gifts upon unwary friends or relatives. Now, deciding on the gift for the top name on your shit-list is no great problem — you just pick up a copy of "America: Why I Love Her" by John Wayne, and let it go at that. But what if you happen to like the person you're getting the gift for?

Regular readers of this rag will know what I'm going to talk about already: classical records, and the paraphernalia that goes with them. There are few things in this life more confusing than being a novice classical music fan looking around the classical department of a record store, wondering how one starts a collection. (How, for example, to choose between twenty different recordings of Beethoven's Fifth?) One of the things worse than that is looking for a classical record to give to a present to a relative or friend who's a classical music fan without yourself being one. Not only do you face the undeniable confusion of an unfamiliar section of the record store, but you haven't the foggiest notion of who wrote what or if it's worth having on record, just letting alone for the movement the thorny problem of the recipient's musical tastes.

Ahem. In most situations, the preferred action would be to forget about the records and look into leather undergarments, but I have stepped into the breach with this amazing guide to gift-giving. Slightly enquire as to the musical tastes of the recipient (one popular method: blindfold him/her with an unwashed, raw halibut and ask for the names of three favourite composers... works every time) and then read on for the considered opinions of yrs. trily.

Opera: this is a huge category, running from inexpensive albums which give the highlights of a given work to extravagant complete sets, loaded down with booklets, posters, and so on. Best to tackle this one in two classifications.

Inexpensive: Not all opera fans want a complete opera on record, preferring instead the best-loved arias or scenes. Virtually every complete recording in the stores today is accompanied by a corresponding highlights disc, so the selection is huge. One fine example is from Mozart's Magic Flute, with Solti conducting (London OS-26257). Other sampler records couple arias from several operas, usually featuring one vocalist. The most exciting one I've heard this year is Marilyn Horne's Greatest Hits (London OS-26346) featuring the "Habanera" and "Seguidilla" from Carmen, as well as arias by Rossini, Meyerbeer and Bellini. One new complete opera in the inexpensive class is Karajan's new rendition of Puccini's La Bohème with an absolutely all-star cast (Mirella Freni, Luciano Pavarotti, Nicolai Ghiaurov) in a first-rate recording. Since it's only 2 discs, it falls in the inexpensive class.

Expensive: the sky's the limit here with an abundance of Wagner's Ring Cycle. There are now four completely different versions of this 19-record mammoth available, and if cost is no object, go ahead. A little more conservatively (but not by much) this year's big-budget blowout is the new recording of Carmen, featuring James McCracken, Leonard Bernstein, and the above-mentioned Marilyn Horne (DG 2709 043). I reviewed this set a few weeks ago, but just to recap: it's the first time Lenny has ever worked for DG, and they pulled out all the stops for him. Horne and McCracken are spectacular, and the whole recording has the hallmarks of an instant classic, much like Callas' earlier recording of the same opera on Angel (S-3650X, still available and still a good bet). The packaging and libretto are slick and attractive; at $20-25 a top-notch gift.

Ballet: Andre Previn has given us a new,

Has the pressure of Christmas shopping got you beat?

dynamic recording of Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet, in its rarely-recorded complete version. Running through three discs, he gives us the music usually only heard in concert, and makes a good case for it. The argument against complete ballet recordings usually has it that the music isn't interesting enough to sustain listener attention without the presence of dancers; so, the companies often give us suites of the music. The present version is pretty exciting stuff, and a good souvenir for any friend or relative who saw the National Ballet production with Nureyev a little while back. The enclosed booklet gives a history of the music, and couple after famous couple are shown as the ill-fated lovers along with rarely-seen photos of the original Bolshoi production. Angel SC 3082. Put on your ballet slippers and pirouette out to get it.

Secred: Hey, wait! Yes, you — come on back here! You don't have to be a Jesus freak or blessed out on Maharaj Ji to appreciate the inspiration and work that went into the masses of masses, cantatas and Passions that make up some of the most gorgeous music in the repertoire. Don't forget that in bygone days, the Church provided many a composer with essential work, leaving us (particularly in Bach's case) with a huge amount of excellent music. Speaking of Bach, look into the series of Cantatas being issued on Telefunken. They're up to Volume 7 now, and each set of two records includes a wealth of literature, essays about the music, and even the scores. (Telefunken SKW 1 through 7, each set about $12). A little more ambitious? DG has issued a new recording of Bach's St. Matthew Passion, conducted by Karajan, with Schreier, Fischer-Dieskau and Ludwig in the cast. A fine reading, and a nice alternative to the somewhat detached, cool performance by Harnoncourt and his authentic-performance crew. Karajan's willing to get involved emotionally to a greater extent, and that makes a difference to these ears, anyway. (Karajan: DG 2711012 Harnoncourt: Telefunken S-9572/5, both about $24)

Solo: another bumper year of sonatas and suites from some of the best artists in the world. The great Chilean pianist Claudio Arrau recorded the complete Beethoven Sonatas for Philips some years ago (and selling for $85!) but now some of the individual records from that 14-disc package are available. A perfect gift for the classical newcomer is the coupling of Ludwig Van's three most famous piano pieces: the Moonlight, Pathetique, and Appassionata sonatas, played in a thoroughly fresh convincing manner. (Philips 6599308) I can hear all the non-neophytes moaning out there ("Is this where he's at? Another recording of the Moonlight Sonata?") so I'll recommend something else for the snobs: Sviatoslav Richter, one of the world's great pianists is more noted for his interpretations of Romantic works than Baroque, yet he has turned out Book I of Bach's Well-Tempered Clavier in a new Angel recording (SRC-4119). Fans of the 48 (the 48 preludes and fugues that make up both books of the WTC, that is) will find his approach different from that of Glenn Gould or Ralph Kirkpatrick. Rather than bring out each line in crystalline clarity, the overall picture is one of sublime contemplation; relatively slow tempos and a singularly distant recorded sound add to the effect. If you already have one recording of the set, it easily could do as a duplication; it's that different, and quite persuasive in making its point. Suffice it to say that Richter's technique is flawless, but I never expected such a sensitive interpretation from a musician who was primarily known for his powerful readings of Tchaikovsky and Prokofiev.

Chamber: I'm afraid my personal preferences are showing here when I choose the Vegh Quartet's new recording of the six Bartok string quartets. This isn't music for everybody, but if your recipient leans towards the more adventurous side of the repertoire, this is a fine choice. Telefunken pressed the three discs involved, and their usual high standards are in effect. (SKH 25083-T1/3) Along more conventional lines is the Beaux Arts Trio's playing of two Dvorak quartets on Philips 6500 402. These Piano Quartets (Piano, Violin, Viola, 'Cello) abound in melody and hum-potential, to coin a phrase, and make a good introduction to the world of chamber music.

Concerto: As usual, there are simply too many records in this catalogue issued every year to even mention, and the vast percentage of them are excellent. With vinyl at a premium (putting it mildly) among the manufacturers today, the chances of a less-than-brilliant performance making it into the flesh are slim. As might be expected, the record companies have adopted an attitude of re-release-the-old-masters, again and again, because they'll sell again and again. Typical is DG's new pressing of the Tchaikovsky and Mendelssohn Violin Concertos, possibly the most over-recorded in the catalogue. Played by Nathan Milstein, there's nothing terribly wrong with them, nor is there anything spectacular. The record comes with a twenty-odd page book about DG, bound right inside the fold of the cover, and as such could do for the very first classical record in a collection. For a really exhilarating rendition of these warhorses, though, try Isaac Stern's classic on Columbia. (Milstein: DG 2530359, Stern: Columbia MS-6062)

How many of you experts out there know any Tchaikovsky piano/orchestra works outside of the Concerto No. 1? I certainly didn't until I got hold of a copy of Werner Hass's playing of the Concert Fantasy and the Andante and Finale on Philips 6500316. Backed by Elihu Inbal and the Monte Carlo Orchestra, Haas gives these neglected works a rip-snorting performance. For your gift-ees who are bored with run-of-the-mill stuff, this is recommended.

Someone once remarked that anyone who admits to not liking Mozart deserves the same fate as a publicly admitted child molester. I'm not sure if I'd be so drastic, but it simply isn't wise to go around proclaiming your hate for Mozart's music. Within that massive catalogue of 620 or so works something must please you. Try giving yer loved one his Flute Concerto, on the same disc as the Oboe Concerto as played by Neville Marriner and the Academy of St. Martin-in-The-Fields on Philips 6500379. Claude Montaux (flute) and Neil Black (oboe) handle the solo parts with great skill, but everything is subordinated to Marriner's overall view: one of smooth playing and elegant turning of phrases, so that what emerges is highly polished, lovingly treated Mozart, quite agreeable stuff. A word to newcomers: Neville Marriner and his Band are programmed to run on 33-hour days; this enables them to run out huge numbers of recordings every year with little apparent effort. Attempts to discover just how they were programmed have met with a stiff rebuke from St. Martin, patron saint of CBC announcers and Record Reviewers.

Symphonies: The main bout. In this category everything from the over-familiar to the unbelievably obscure is issued, and who knows — your prospective recipient might get his or her rocks off to something from either end! At the familiar end of things: the Karajan recordings of the Beethoven 9 are always popular, singly or in the big box. Since the big year of the Bicentennial (1970), DG hasn't been able to keep enough of this set in stock. Other preferred recordings of the Beethoven canon are Böhm's (also on DG), Bruno Walter's (a steal on Columbia Odyssey Y7-30051, about $22) or Toscanini's classic mono recordings (RCA). Solti's new recording of the Ninth (London CSP-8) is highly recommended as well.

A little less familiar are the symphonies of William Boyce, a late Baroque English composer. These pieces are not really symphonies as we use the term, running about four minutes each. As a matter of fact, on Angel S-36951 Yehudi Menuhin and his Menhin Festival Orchestra play all eight of these miniatures on one disc. The music is good-natured and bouncy, something along the lines of Handel's Concerti Grossi.

There are some big boxes on the market this fall, the chief symphony offering being the complete Bruckner opus conducted by Bernard Haitink and the Concertgebouw Orchestra (Philips 6717 002). Weighing in at over $55, it's definitely in the heavyweight class, but if your name is spelled B-a-s-s-e-t ask daddy for it. Haitink's approach to Bruckner is passionate and vibrant, bringing out all the violent force of the scherzo movements. He doesn't handle the Adagio segments with the same persuasive refinement that Eugen Jochum does on DG, but on the whole the symphonies come off better under his baton. By the way, Jochum's complete set is available again, as part of DG's excellent (if expensive) "Symphony Edition". The Bruckner set will set you back some fifty dollars, but you get a large, lavish art book about the symphony with the 12 records. Actually a better bargain than the Philips box, which has no such accompanying book. (Jochum: DG 2721 010)

Rachmaninoff's Piano Concertos are well known, but his symphonies have not received the wide playing of the virtuoso piano/orchestra combinations in this country. Andre Previn's new recording of the Second (Angel S-36954) with the London Symphony is highly recommended. The music appeals instantly on a basic emotional level, running over an hour (on one disc) of sometimes lyrical, sometimes

A good stocking-stuffer: a subscription to Stereo Review or High Fidelity, or perhaps a new stylus for the cartridge. For more elaborate giving, try one of the most elaborate record cleaners (such as Parastat ($15) or Lencoclean/L ($14)). Fresh inner liners for record jackets or even new record sleeves also make good, if a little drab, gifts. And of course there's blank tape for the open-reel or cassette buff.

If all the preceding strikes you as good advice, but you're in no hurry to patronize the huge shops, remember that here in Tronna we're fortunate to have some alternate stores that add more of a personal touch to shopping than the Yonge St. giants. Topping the list is Round Records, now with a new classical section; you'll have to look pretty hard to find better prices than here. Coming up fast (at least in terms of selection), though, is the Book Cellar's Music Room at their Avenue Rd. location, at Yorkville. They stock almost every imported item, including some offbeat British pressings that don't make their way to these shores all too often. A & A's and Sam's have all the records I've described at acceptable prices, and if you exult in treatment that a sardine would relish, then come 'round here a week before the jolly day. Just along that unpleasant line of thought, it might not be a bad idea to get all your record buying (classical or otherwise) done early this year. Aside from the crowding aspect, the serious vinyl shortage will mean limited stocks for even the biggest outlets. Buy early in order to escape being forced to buy at high-priced shops, or facing the prospect of no records at all.

Along Hi-Fi lines, there are a good many places in the city to buy paraphernalia, but one of the most interesting is Pure Sound, on Wellesley just a few doors west of Yonge. They sell their own speakers, big-name components, and all the gizmos that fill an audiophile's heart with delight. Lencoclean users take note: I bought a bottle of Lencoclean there for $1.75, a lot less than the "going" price. Don't forget the discounts — the service may be ghastly, but the prices are good.

That about rounds it up, but I'll be at my usual place for the next little while (in front of Sid Smith with a large placard reading "Self-Determination for Micronesia — Now!!") ready to answer your questions or comments on my highly personal selection of records. Address all correspondence to: Classic Music Editor, Varsity, 91 St. George St.

What's sub

movies

Looking back over the season it hasn't been too bad, so if holiday spirits direct you to movie houses you might keep in mind the following:

Don Shebb's Between Friends, an honest, accurate-feeling movie about the relations of a small group of friends who are incidentally planning a payroll robbery.

Under Milkwood: Dylan Thomas' script is so much richer than almost everything that, even if they had butchered the movie awfully, it would still be worth going to. And they didn't butcher the movie.

Truffaut's Day for Night, a very lightweight but understanding and likeable piece about the old style of movie-making.

Robert Altman's The Long Goodbye (see the review in today's issue.)

Jan Troell's The New Land: Troell's highly acclaimed sequel to his brilliant The Emigrants opens Boxing Day at the International Cinema.

Otherwise, you take your chances.

Once more we recommend Toronto's repertory houses: the Revue, the Roxy, the Kensington, Cinémaulière, and the new Cinemathek (on Yonge a half-mile north of Eglinton). The prices and the movies are the best in town. All publish lists of what's coming up which are by and large true. Among the season's fare, Mon Oncle Antoine, Murder of the Heart and, for one night only, a week Saturday at Cinemathek, Les Enfants du Paradis, the movie many consider the best ever made. But always phone first.

Remember: on Feb. 6, The Projectionist will be at the Roxy. But when will someone show Wee Gordie?

Happy Solstice everybody! All sorts of things are going on in this holiday season, from the CBC to the EJS (regular readers will doubtless know the meaning of these arcane symbols). Starting next Monday, CBL-FM presents a series on Anarchy, and it runs through Jan. 11. Should be a typical CBC production: music, slick production and those strange announcements.

Speaking of strange announcements, if you're caught home on the holidays and have the ol' wireless on, do try to avoid CBC about 11 AM. The MC for that hour is an obnoxious twit from Vancouver, who ravishes the very words he reads, occasionally taking two or three minutes out to talk about the pronunciation of a particular word. Also, the 10 AM show claims to have a knowledgeable musician for the host (Allan McFee) but I heard him attribute Pavane pour une Infante Defunte to Debussy (when we all know it was written by Palestrina).

A highly-placed correspondent in the Computer Sciences Dept. writes to say that Lencotonic is made up of 5 percent ethyl alcohol, and may be cheaper at the LCBO than anywhere else.

The TSO plays away all through the season, with a surfeit of Handel's Messiah on the agenda. Vocal music freaks can satisfy their wildest self-indulgent dreams on the 15th, when Elmer Iseler conducts a special along-performance, all seats unreserved at $4 a shot. You sit by vocal range, and bring your own scores. All together now "Hal-le-lu-jah". If there are kid-types in your family take them along to the Dec 21 performance of the Symphony, when five stars of the Toronto Maple Leafs and their coach will give their world concert debuts of Haydn's Toy

Symphony. Also on the same bill, U of T's own Godfrey Ridout narrates The Christmas Story. Any of Prof. Ridout's students know what a marvelous story-teller he is, so this performance should be a delight.

On a more serious front, the New Chamber Orchestra of Canada gives their second concert in their Hart House series Dec. 16 at 8:30. The last concert was a standing-room-only sellout, so try to get your tickets early for this one.

Poetry fans can hear everybody's favourite Russian versifier at St. Mike's this afternoon at 4:10 p.m. (in Brennan Hall) This is his first Toronto appearance in quite some time and should be worth it.

And topping it all for vinyl addicts, boxing day may see a return of the great sales. With the oncoming shortage and price-hike situation, this may well be the last of the big sales. Hints: get there early, especially if A&A is running the same promotion as last year. With every $5 purchase, they gave away a silver dollar, but there were virtually no other discounts. When the silver bucks were all given out, there were no more discounts of any sort.

Furthermore, they wouldn't let you buy things with the silver smackers, so by about one in the afternoon, the bulk of the customers found only regular prices in what was advertised as the Year's Biggest Sale. Sam's still discounts things, but the small size of the classical dept. means that those who want to buy a lot or look around for a bit will have to get there early—try 8 AM. No word on Sherman's or the Book Cellar yet, and ignore Music World.

All that said, do try to buy anything you really hunger for before the beginning of the new year. I hate to spoil anyone's winter break, but do remember that the oil companies will be upping the price on crude to the vinyl producers when contracts expire, and a good many of them expire on the last day of December. So put on Bach's Christmas Oratorio, or Handel's Messiah, or even Alice Cooper—and have a good holiday.

Are you a voyeur, an exhibitionist or perhaps just an under-rated talent? George Brown College is holding a winter festival and city wide talent contest on December 12. Persons Interested in performing may contact Mrs. Margaret Booth at 957-1212, ext. 425. It begins at 7:00 p.m. at the Casa Loma Campus, 160 Kendal Avenue. Admission is $1.00 with refreshments after the contest.

Canada's master of mime, Paul Gaulin, will head his four-member Compagnie de Mime in a five-show run at the UC Playhouse, 79a St. George Street, Wednesday-Saturday, December 12-15. The performances, entitled The Art of Silence, are a mixture of comic and tragic, poetic and satirical pieces. The programme starts at 8:30, with a 3 pm Saturday matinee, and student tickets are $1.00.

Now running at the same time as Sticks and Stones: The Donnelly's Part One, at the Tarragon Theatre, is another Reaney work Listen To The Wind. The second play, set in a Perth County farm house, uses a play within a play to show the struggle of a young boy with illness and his parents' possible separation. It is in performance at the Actors' Theatre on Dupont. Student tickets are $2.50.

Continuing during the Christmas holocaust are All the Ghosts at Theatre Passe Muraille, Once In A Lifetime at the Firehall Theatre, Don't Drink the Water at the Colonnade Theatre plus a veritable Santa's bagful of other little goodies too numerous to mention. For a different sort of holiday treat you might try some of the children's shows; they are often much more fun than plays geared to the average, alienated, depressed, conscience-stricken, morally confused, essay-ridden college student. Until we meet again, may your nights be merry and bright, and your theatrical outings just right, may the Sugar Plum fairy make exams seem a breeze and Santa appear with tuition fee arrears, may new winter mitts in your Christmas stockings denotate fuel fears to something less shocking, and may your New Year's celebration be a joyous obliteration... so until the space runs out and the New Year runs in, remember there's more in '74. Happy trails to you...

Not much to report. A spate of "Christmas shows" around town for generous people with taste and means. A show of African Jewellery at the Albert White Gallery opens tomorrow. The press release is glowing. Lots of watercolor, graphics and drawing shows. On campus, the Bertram Brooker show at Hart House continues.

Incidentally, those interested in good art books at reduced prices should check out the new bookstore half a block east of Yonge on Gloucester (two blocks north of Wellesley). The selection is uneven, and completely disorganized and dust covers are liable to be tattered, but the prices more than compensate. It has a big sign saying "Wholesale Books" and listing its prices (1 - 5 dollars) in the window.

success

Jack J. Wall, we are told, is a young man in a hurry.

At least that's what Gino Empry Public Relations said in a press release a couple of weeks ago.

In glowing prose, Gino explained how Wall was going to blow open the old porn magazine market with a new Playboy-style magazine.

This one, crowed Gino, would combine business, humor, sex and — yes — Canadian nationalism.

It's enough to make Mel Watkins turn over in his grave.

The title was to be — Success.

"You've got to be kidding," a friend of mine said. "Not Success — that's too blatant."

Gino Empry does not kid. Success magazine is on the stands, and fulfilling all its early promise.

It's an eloquent tribute to the art of packaging and proves that form can exist without any content.

Success' first bonanza issue follows the money-making Hefner format so closely it's embarrassing.

We have a Success interview starting up the mag (this one is with Shakespearean actor William Hurt and proves the old adage that to permit actors to talk about themselves is to court the most incredible pretentiousness).

We have the standard men's magazine cartoons — Santa Claus in a brothel, a guy sticking his hand up a girl's crotch — really funny stuff.

Then of course there are the articles (remember the guys in high school who claimed they read Playboy because of the articles). One recounts a speech given by a U of T hygienist on the sex lives of old people, another is a love and peace namby-pamby item, a third a straight violence macho thing ("The semi-jacketed hollow-point bullets hit the man with a hammer blow and knocked him over the machine and into the snow").

And there are the sex pix. The standard plastic-wrapped porn shots with cutesie captions like "I still really dig trees. I want to be happy. So, I'm simply a person in pursuit of happiness."

One section shows a couple of groovers having sex (we only get to see from the waists up). The passion is almost intense enough to ruffle the man's Mr. Ivan hairstyle.

Captions with the sex scene include lines obviously stolen from back issues of the Twink like... "His partner will be amazed not only by his insights but by the depth of his penetration... under his firm guidance they will come together into the realm of enlightenment."

Success might argue that it's not a chauvinist magazine since it shows both men and women. Even in its own terms that's not really true. But if we assume they're correct, it only proves that what's wrong with sex magazines is not only anti-womenness, but their anti-humanness.

A note about the publisher: Gino Empry informs us that Jack J. Wall was until 1972, the vice-president of White Rock Estates, Ltd. That, if you'll remember was the real estate company with the ads inviting us "To own a piece of Canada." White Rock was also the subject of a series of articles in the Toronto Star in 1972. We'd say more except that the suit brought by White Rock against the Star is still in progress. Jack J. Wall wears a purple shirt with an open neck; the hair on his head is styled — we don't know about the hair on his chest.

Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee, two blues artists who continue to improve with age, begin a three week engagement at the Riverboat, 134 Yorkville, on December 18. Their last LP called "Sonny and Brownie" (A&M) is a glorious, well produced collection of tunes that should not be missed.

Tunesmith, Jack Shechtman plays Fiddler's Green (489-3001) tonight, and Gordon Bok is featured in a special ($2.50) concert on Tuesday. John Roberts and Tony Barrand, British traditional singers are slated for next Friday, and Bill Steel comes in from California on December 21. Adam Mitchell is the last performer of the year (on December 28). The $1 admission policy continues except for special concerts.

Jesse Winchester who got a disappointing reception at Convocation Hall in October, will be back in town next week at the Colonial.

Most of the concerts from now to the year's end are the monstrous Maple Leaf Gardens variety. Emerson, Lake and Palmer kick things off tonight and Alice Cooper checks in with his glittery brand of decadence next Friday, called the "Billion Dollar Babies Show". Both groups are arriving in time to plug their just released albums, "Brain Salad Surgery" by ELP and the provocatively titled, "Muscle of Love" by Cooper.

There are two New Years Eve bashes this year. Winter Pop IV at the Gardens brings together the an unlikely combination of musical styles. Seals and Crofts, and England Dan and John Ford Cooley will undoubtedly have to fight it out with Crowbar and the Stompers. The Victory Theatre features a repeat of the Mainline Bump and Grind Review that prompted the atrocious album of the same name. The evening can't possibly be as bad as the record.

Ringo, (Capitol), is surprisingly an excellent album, mainly due the help of ol' Ringo got from his friends, including Lennon, McCartney, Harrison, The Band and many more. Richard Perry's production is superb. This may be the closest we ever get to another Beatles' album.

Mind Games (Capitol), will not be to everyone's taste. John Lennon is back to form in writing and singing, and the style is very near to that on Imagine. Lennon does the producing this time and oddly enough doesn't play any instruments on this one. The backup band includes the excellent guitarist David Spinozza. Strange that guitar line in "Fredda People" is a direct cop from George Harrison's "If Not For You". Could Dr. Winston O'boogie be Dr. John?

Grey Cup ideals nothing more than shallow attempt at 'tinsel nationalism' Hoch says

By PAUL HOCH

"The Grey Cup," declared the offensive center for the Ottawa Rough Riders after the big game, "is essential to Canadian culture."

Other commentators claimed that the big spectacle in the CNE coliseum last week is one of our national rituals, one of the few things on which all Canadians can unite, and which brings together a geographically and culturally diverse nation. In this sense national spectacles like the Grey Cup, Stanley Cup championship, College Bowl and the Olympics correspond quite closely with the tribal rituals of primitive peoples. The idea is for the whole tribe to whoop it up at the established rituals, with established chiefs there (like the Governor-General and provincial premiers) to give out awards and bask in the aura of tribal solidarity and potency.

What are Grey Cup's 'values'?

However, if events like the Grey Cup unite the country, one must ask what are the values these spectacles unite us around. In the big game two weeks ago, Ottawa won basically by cracking the ribs of Edmonton's quarterback. The values stressed in such modern rituals would thus seem to place a heavy premium on violence and competition, rather than intra-tribal stability and co-operation.

As such, rather than resembling the more passive rituals of those we call primitives, events like the Grey Cup seem to correspond much more closely with the bread-and-circuses gladiator spectacles of the ancient Roman Coliseum which provided a heady opium for the rabble in the early days of what is called the Christian era.

In the CNE Coliseum's Grey Cup spectacle, as in Roman times, the leading gladiators were drawn from a foreign populace, and it is indeed ironic how the exploits of a predominantly American group of major CFL heroes has been used to whip up what is described as a 'Canadian' national identity. Of course, in the Stanley Cup hockey playoffs the situation is reversed, and Canadians are supposed to acquire a national identity by watching their home grown hockey heroes compete with cities like Boston, New York and Chicago. Thus, in both of Canada's main national sporting rituals, it seems as if the national identity has been heavily mortgaged to the American imperium.

An important aspect of the ancient Roman gladiator spectacles was the sanctifying presence of scantily clad vestal virgins to bless the combatants. Today the vestal virgin function at these rituals has been taken over by the cheerleaders, girls' drill teams, drum majorettes, baton twirlers and Miss Grey Cup. They provide the right degree of sexual tension for the battle, while preserving the correct virginal, girl-next-door image of purity.

Sex and the police

An interesting aspect of the ritual was the use of these modern vestal virgins to link the glamorous area of sexuality with Canada's established vehicle of police violence, the RCMP. At halftime, a girls' drill team, dressed in red police uniforms, pranced and strutted through precision military drill steps to give a tribute to the RCMP. After making the correct ritualistic obeisances to the country's secret police, the girls quickly stripped to scanty chorus girl costumes (this in the freezing weather of early winter) and provided yet another eyeful for Canada's spectacle-starved 'fans'. (The word 'fan' is, of course, merely a shortened form of the word 'fanatic' from which it is derived.)

Meanwhile the CTV announcer, lingering lovingly over the vital statistics of Miss Grey Cup, pointed out that she was the only contest entrant whose chest was substantial enough to support the entire 'Miss Grey Cup' banner.

Thus are Canadians 'united,' united around American football heroes, modern day vestal virgins, drooling tv commentators, a bread-and-circuses spectacle for the masses, complete with the values of gladiator militarism, the RCMP, and a healthy dose of sexism. Nor does the national unity descend very far into the stadium stands. By in large it is only a patriotic audience that can afford the $17-and-up ticket prices for the big game. Today, ordinary working plebeians get their national ritual largely via the tv.

Football and society

"Pro football," writes University of Guelph philosophy professor and former Calgary linebacker John McMurtry, "has become a sick society's projection of itself into public spectacle." He notes that the first principle of football is possession—maintaining control of the desired object (the ball) and excluding competitors by rule-governed violence from getting it: 'possession' the key to football, 'private property' the key to this society; legalized violence the ultimate sanction of both. It is no accident.

"The correlation between the growing importance of political authoritarianism in North America," he continues, "and the increasing popularity of big time football spectacles should not be overlooked. If this appears to be an accidental connection, consider such things as football players having the shortest hair and beating up protesters on college campuses; pro teams being sanctuaries of racism; the US president's favorite recreation being watching football; patriotic displays being most evident at big football games; and dean of coaches Vince Lombardi's famous remark that, 'Discipline, this is what football is.'"

"Exclusive possession, acquisitiveness, relentless violence, impersonality, ruthless competition, technological sophistication and strict authoritarianism — these are the dimensions of North America's favorite sport. Anyone who looks carefully at the society we live in, and who reminds himself that citizens and football fans are not different people, cannot avoid making connections. The game inside the stadium and the game outside are as alike as the adoring roars that greet touchdowns and police powers," he concludes.

'Circus for the hordes'

Former US Congressman Emmanuel Celler has said that games like pro football and hockey "provide the circus for the hordes." New York University professor Roscoe Brown has called mass spectator sports "the new opium of the people." Perhaps 'opium' seems too strong a word for all this. But what else can you call it when several million Canadians professed more concern over who would win the Grey Cup than over who would win the recent Québec election? What else can you call it when the nation's enthusiasm for the big game allows it to totally ignore the tanks in the streets of Athens and Santiago? What else can you call it when North American industrial workers are often so rabidly involved with the fates of their sports heroes that they're perfectly oblivious to the approximately three million serious injuries that occur every year in their own North American factories?

In this connection it's perhaps useful to recall to what extent North American pro sports have traditionally been aimed at potentially restless or disadvantaged minority groups and factory workers. Hockey for example, grew up in the mining and factory towns of northern Ontario and Québec, and still gets many of its best players there. Indeed, the watching of their professional hockey heroes still provides the main pseudo-identity for Québec's French-speaking population.

American football players have disproportionately come from the coal and steel towns of Pennsylvania (home territory of people like Joe Namath and Jimmy Jones). And English soccer also grew up in the shadows of the factories. These sports were generally considered their various low paid jobs.

Escapism no solution

The trouble with the entertainment and escapism of professional sports, though, is that it provides no escape at all. The problems of one's workday life go on just as before. The only difference is that so much time and energy is absorbed in watching sports and boning up on the fine points of every game that it almost the chevron—don ballinger

by factory owners as a fitting outlet for their workers' job-produced tensions. An outlet far more suitable — at least from their point of view — than militant trade unionism.

American basketball, too, has long been the sport of the big city ghettos, with a sizable portion of the top professional players coming from New York's Harlem ghetto. The same holds true for boxing, which for a hundred years has been dominated by whatever ethnic or racial group happened to be on the bottom of the social pyramid. The same is true for professional wrestling, a sport which provides stereotyped heroes and villains to suit the taste of every ethnic group (the bad guys being inevitably such as Arabs, Mongols, Nazis, Japs and lately such prototype Oriental 'commies' as Gorilla Monsoon). Indeed the opiates of pro wrestling are experiencing quite a boom among Montréal's different ethnic communities. It certainly helps to take their minds off ensures that little or no time is available for solving the real problems.

For a few hours on 'Grey Cup Day', Canadians can consume the tinsel heroism of largely imported super-football heroes, can gawk at their modern day vestal virgins, can whoop it up for the Governor-General and the RCMP, can bet a couple of million dollars on which set of gladiators will win the big circus, in short, can escape to a fairy dreamland in which men are Men and God is always on our team's side.

And, the next day, all of us fans can return to our boring, repetitive, uncreative, often bureaucratized jobs. It seems to be as good a drug as any other. The new opium of the people.

Paul Hoch, a humanities lecturer at Dawson College, is the author of Rip Off the Big Game, a study of the political and social aspects of sport.

Workers suspended after Artistic settlement

By TIM GALLAGHER

Nine workers from Canadian Textile and Chemical Union (CTCU) have been suspended from their jobs at two Artistic Woodwork plants in North York.

A long and bitter strike over union recognition and a management rights clause ended Tuesday.

The CTCU won union recognition in its first contract and freedom from arbitrary discipline measures management was seeking.

Refusal by management to take back four categories of strikers prolonged the strike by 11 more days.

Finally, all strikers were allowed to return to work although the union expected nine workers arrested during the strike would be suspended.

Arbitration will commence immediately. The decision to reinstate the workers will be determined by one union representative, one management representative, and a chairman likely to be chosen by Ontario Labor Minister Fern Gindoff. Arbitration could take six months or more.

Formerly the union had argued that to suspend the workers before they had returned to work contravened the Labor Relations Act. Such action would also place the workers in double jeopardy, the union maintained.

Once they faced the courts, they would have to approach management, which stated it would not take back anyone convicted.

Conceivably, however, the workers not taken back could still face courts before receiving a decision on their employment status.

The union now represents just over one-third of the workers at the two Artistic plants.

Meanwhile at the St. Lawrence

Centre on Front Street, the CTCU held a public forum on the Artistic Woodwork strike. It announced the union has formed a strike committee to plead the cases of those arrested. It was also stated the main task of the committee would be to have the charges against the arrested strikers and supporters dropped.

There were 118 people arrested during the strike. Of these, nine were strikers and the rest strike supporters.

After the nine strikers were suspended from their jobs the Ontario Attorney-General Dalton Bales notified the CTCU charges were not being dropped.

UofT complains of decrease, figures show enrollment up

By TOM GRAND

On December 1, various U of T colleges were to submit enrolment figures for this year, but these statistics are presently in the process of being compiled, and a full report is to be available early in January.

The latest report for all campus was on October 30, 1973.

It indicates a slight increase in the total student population. The full-time population, undergraduates and graduates, on the St. George campus was projected to rise from 23,432 as of December 1, 1972 to 24,141 this year.

The part time population was expected to drop slightly from 10,385 as of December 1, 1972, to 10,181 this year.

On the whole St. George's campus is expected to increase to 34,322 from 33,816.

Scarborough College is predicting an increase in its full-time enrolment to 2,480 from 2,141 and a drop in their part-time population to 1,100 from 1,132.

Overall Scarborough estimates an increase to 3,580 from 3,273 students.

Erindale College anticipates an increase in both its full-time and part-time population from an overall total of 3,111 last year to 3,408 in December 1973.

All together the total for U of T's 1973-74 population is expected to be up to 41,310 compared to 40,200 in 1972.

THE GOVERNING COUNCIL NOTICE

The Internal Affairs Committee and Academic Affairs Committee of the Governing Council again draw to the attention of members of the University Community that both Committees will continue to receive, for consideration, all responsible suggestions for amendments to the discipline proposals, and encourage submissions in this regard.

Individuals or groups who wish to comment on substantive issues related to this subject, should communicate their interest to Mrs. M. Paikin, Chairman, Internal Affairs Committee, Room 106, Simcoe Hall.

Research: marijuana prevents epileptic seizures electrical charges in rats, monkeys, cats and baboons.

A gradual onset of convulsions were induced by stimulating specific areas of the brain, and while at first there was no reaction, a continuation of the stimulation led to the type of convulsive clinical symptoms seen in humans.

The THC had little effect in controlling the full-blown convulsions, but when used earlier in the progression of stimulations, "it seems to have fairly potent effects" in curbing the development of the full convulsions.

Wada indicated the medical profession has divided opinions on whether a person who just received a head injury should be treated on the small chance the individual might develop epilepsy. At present there is no standardized method to prevent the onset of the disease.

Wada cautions translating his laboratory results to human treatment too quickly.

One point he makes is his research tends to indicate effective dosages for a fully advanced seizure case might be toxic.

Secondly, THC is rarely available from street dealers despite their claims to the contrary. Numerous studies done on the quality of street drugs indicate what often is claimed to be the THC is usually something else, like LSD or speed.

Thirdly, Wada's experiments involved injecting controlled amounts of THC into the animal, a process he does not recommend for the non-medical lay person.

Wada responds to the "street knowledge" which claims marijuana is good for epileptics, saying: "Well, I don't know I'm quite sceptical. But a scientist has to keep his mind open."

"If he has a flexible mind, he might bump into something significant."

Wada's research began about a year and half ago when two of his Vancouver patients told him on separate occasions they thought their dope smoking was helping their seizures.

"Both were suffering from fairly frequent seizures but were under reasonable control through treatment with a combination of conventional recognized agents," Wada said.

While he personally "could not, myself, see their claim that smoking grass helped," he dug through research papers and came up with two 1940 American studies reporting THC had suppressed electrically induced convulsions in small animals.

"As a neurologist, I was most interested. I also knew that most research into marijuana had only been into its adverse effects."

"The findings had not been followed up for some reason, but I suppose it had something to do with the general outcry against the abuse of marijuana," Wada said.

That outcry had not died down. Earlier this year, a Yorkville Avenue dentist, whose patients ranged from dope-smoking street types to more traditional clientele, reported marijuana helped prevent cavities.

He based his conclusion on his years of practice with the two groups and his finding of marijuana smokers have less plaque, and hence fewer cavities, than non-dope smokers.

A separate study in the US earlier this year also indicated marijuana may help reduce pressure in eyes and therefore help glaucoma sufferers.

'New definitions of socialism needed'

That new definitions of socialism will have to be worked out was the consensus of a conservative feminist, an uneasy editor and NDP leader Stephen Lewis as they participated in a far-ranging panel on the NDP and its critics at OISE Wednesday evening.

Laura Sabia, chairwoman of the Ontario Committee on the Status of Women and director of a popular talk show in St. Catharines attacked the party for its lack of principle and charged the party contained too many liberals like Manitoba Premier Ed Schreyer.

Lewis, admitting to discomfort on the subject of Schreyer, asserted opposition to corporate politics was a clear line of differentiation for the NDP. He also asserted that redistribution of power was the primary purpose of the party.

"Everything else is instinct," he claimed.

Mike Cross, U of T history professor and editor of Canadian Forum, was critical of the party for wavering from "the touchstone of socialist politics," public ownership, and expressed considerable unease about the role of the international unions in the party.

Lewis replied state intervention rather than public ownership was the touchstone of socialist politics. "Everyone yawns when we call for public ownership," he claimed and called for more "creative" approaches to Canada's problems.

Claiming the Ontario government was moving to dismantle and privatize Ontario Hydro, he insisted state intervention, which could in a wide variety of situations mean public ownership remained the key differentiation of Ontario politics.

Throughout the ten-part series of lectures, speakers have been consumed with two major themes: a philosophical definition of the NDP relative to its opponents on the right and left; and the practical task of winning power.

In a party which, according to lecture organizer Gordon Vichert, "few people have the opportunity to think beyond where the next office typewriter will come from and what the NDP will say on the milk board issue," participants have tried to elaborate a definition of the NDP as social democratic in philosophy.

This represents a substantially different battleground for an NDP leadership which was previously content to define itself as either "liberal" or "socialist." One might now say they have rejected the definition of themselves as "liberals in a hurry" in favor of one which sees them as "socialists taking their time."

The course has also been concerned with placing the NDP within the realities of mainstream Canadian politics, hopeful that this way may be a precursor to their taking power.

"We are finally defining ourselves in the context of Ontario rather than indulging in dogmatic generalizations," Lewis claimed. "This marks a fundamental change in NDP attitudes."

The rejection of outright socialism was frequently justified as the only course palatable to the Canadian public.

CUA chairwoman congratulates herself

By MARK APPLEBY

Reva Gerstein, chairman of the Committee on University Affairs, claims the CUA "has had the best dialogue they've ever had with the universities of Ontario this year."

"Last year," she went on to say, "we never went out of the building."

I'm not afraid of being out in the open

After listening to briefs presented by presidents of various Ontario universities and "whoever else wanted to join in," Dr. Gerstein says the value of the CUA has been confirmed in her eyes.

"Deep philosophical questions have been focused upon. The university is very important in the way it approaches problems."

The CUA collects these ideas and passes them onto the Ministry of Education, acting as a liaison between the universities and the provincial government.

Gerstein stated: "The committee is made up of half academics and half industrialists. The industrialists are such people as members of the board of directors for large companies as BP, and A.E. Ames (a large stock broking firm)."

At present there are three empty places on the committee which should be occupied by industrialists or non-academics. One of these positions was occupied by the late Leslie Frost, former premier of Ontario.

A brief presented to the committee by the U of T last week stated many professors found first year students were ill-prepared in the "core" subjects as evidenced over the last two years.

Gerstein had this to say: "This is a direct result of the Hall-Dennis Report. High school teachers took the permissive aspects of the recommendations forward in the report to an extreme."

"Teachers in high schools," she added, "are not well informed on how to institute the recommendations of the Hall-Dennis Report and now we're beginning to see the result."

With respect to Ontario Student Awards Program Gerstein said: "One problem with OSAP is that many of the people who most need it don't use it. It's common for a parent to refuse to sign the necessary forms. This is especially common in the case of females whose fathers don't want them to attend a university. OSAP is not palatable to a lot of people."

As for the future of the CUA: "At present the role of the replacing body for the CUA is being defined. The ministry would be out of its mind to not have a CUA or similar body to replace it."

Hospital conditions condemned

Following protests over the firing of a black worker, members of the housekeeping department at Sunnybrook Hospital have pressured their union and the administration into improving working conditions.

At the last meeting of the Union of Local 777 Sunnybrook Hospital Employees executive was faced with a group of workers demanding the fired employee, Maxwell Smith, be rehired and working conditions be improved.

The executive passed a motion to end the meeting preventing the issues from formally being raised.

Sunnybrook is administered by the U of T.

More recently, members of the Housekeeping Department decided to write a letter to the union protesting racial discrimination and poor working conditions.

Instead, a letter addressed to Workers' Action Movement (WAM) stated on July 26 the housekeeping staff was called to a general meeting.

At the meeting they were told of additional or expanded duties which the supervisory staff had decided upon. Among the endless list of duties were the following: "refrigerators to be cleaned daily, utility rooms, sinks, tables, and other things daily...stripping, washing, and making 35-38 beds a day plus the cleaning of bedside lockers."

In addition, the nursing station and the halls have to be cleaned.

The letter emphasized all this has to be done by one person in eight hours. This sort of speed-up was imposed upon the workers by the administration according to the letter.

It went on to state: "Over the past three years workers haven't been receiving shift premiums for night work."

The head supervisor it stated "stuck many of the black girls on nights to work for three long months without any shift premium benefits."

The letter concluded: "Sunnybrook needs a good union with good management."

Kenora natives fight Ottawa: write own history

KENORA (CUP) — It wasn't another Wounded Knee, as was first feared. In fact, the demonstration was so well ordered and co-operative that members of the occupying force were busy cleaning up the offices, sweeping floors and emptying garbage before evacuating the building.

The 24-hour occupation of the department of Indian affairs offices in Kenora began early November 27 as a group of 30 to 40 well organized members of the Ojibway Warriors' Society walked into the federal building.

Five demands listed

As soon as it secured the department's offices on the second floor, the Society set out five grievances it wished rectified before it would give up control of the building.

The demands included:

- immediate compensation for the victims of mercury poisoning on the Grassy Narrows Reserve,

- an end to unnecessary violence and beatings inflicted on members of the Indian community by the local police,

- definite action by the local and provincial governments as well as department of Indian affairs to eliminate racial discrimination against members of the Indian community,

- return of the Indian artifacts now in the possession of several museums to their rightful owners—in particular several scrolls of significant religious value to the members of the Ojibway Medicine Society.

- an end to the James Bay Project, which will, if carried to completion result in the relocation of many Indian peoples.

Other demands included improving general conditions for Indian students brought to the town for schooling, as well as requests for rights to economic freedom for the reserves.

However, these were finally pared down to one major demand by the end of the occupation — mercury contamination compensation.

Following the issuing of these demands, the Society made several attempts to communicate with Minister of Indian Affairs, Jean Chretien. The department would not talk with them the first day, but had dispatched a department member to confer with them the second day.

Indians to fight if necessary

In discussing the Indians' demands, Barry Caldwell, a fieldworker with the American Indian Movement (AIM), said they were a desperate people, they would not surrender before the occupation was scheduled to end, and would fight if necessary.

According to police reports, vigilantes were preparing outside to move on the building. It was later discovered this was pure fabrication on the part of the police.

Caldwell stated that the government must act immediately on the situation in the Grassy Narrows Reserves, where apparently one person had already died of mercury poisoning, and "based on the levels of mercury in their bodies, four others should be dead."

Commenting on the James Bay project, he said this went further than most people could appreciate. It involves moving a people from their traditional homes, where generations of ancestors have been buried, and changing a lifestyle they have known since before the 16th century.

When asked how this affected the occupying local Indians, he said, "They're our brothers. We have to care for our brothers. The police have to get away from this 'cowboy and Indian' image they have here. They have to always prove themselves superior by beating the Indian.... Those days are over."

Chief Lou Cameron, co-chairman of the Ojibway Warriors' Society, felt the needs to be even greater than those demands issued by the entire group earlier in the occupation.

"We want basic freedom of government," he said, "complete economic co-jurisdiction over our communities, not necessarily a sovereign state independent of Canada, but a more responsible 'department', governing ourselves... guaranteeing independence in a new and more humane government."

The Union—Cecil Epps

Chief Lou Cameron: "This is just the beginning. We are starting to write history now."

"Society as it is now, is going to collapse soon. You can see this all around us. We see a new type of government coming... with not so many institutions."

"You've either got to care for your brother or not. Institutions try to split people up, both individually and socially. We (members of the Warriors' Society) are going back to our elders, and learning the old ways. We try and keep our people together, with themselves, so we're not schizophrenics, or anything like that, and we're together as a people. This way we can have personal, societal and governmental unity."

Cameron felt that, as an institution, the department of Indian affairs was not allowing the Indian people to come together as a nation or people as it should, citing the reservations as a prime example. He believed the Indian people in the Kenora district were feeling more united as a people as a result of the Society's teachings.

Indians should start to actualize their history, not just read about it. Chief Cameron said he felt closer to their great traditional chief of the past, by actually "living and making history" rather than just knowing what happened two or three hundred years ago.

November 27, he added, should be a holiday for local Indian children in years to come, for this is their history.

No reply from Ottawa

The occupation was to last for 24 hours. But, at 9 am on November 28th, no word had been received from Ottawa on a tentatively scheduled meeting with a representative from the department of Indian affairs.

The Society chiefs decided they would wait, and continue the occupation until word came from Chretien's office. In the words of Chief Cameron, "We're going to be here for a while."

Meanwhile, preparations were made to defend the offices, whether from the vigilantes rumoured to be ready outside or the police.

At 9:30 a meeting was held by the 80 Indians in the building at the time. It was decided that the occupants under 18 would leave the building by the back door. Thirty high school students had been in the building since Tuesday afternoon.

No explanation could be given of this since the entire meeting was carried on in Ojibway. When asked why, Chief Cameron said "We're just taking care of our community, just taking care."

However, the atmosphere was very tense from that point on. Nothing much was said: people moved to the entrances taking up guard, waiting for a phone call from Ottawa.

Shortly after 10 am the phone call was received saying a member of the Indian affairs regional office in Toronto would be in Kenora in a matter of minutes.

Amid mumbblings of "puppet" and other not-too-complimentary comments, Chief Cameron told the press that the Indians would remain in the department offices until the meeting was finished.

Chief Cameron wanted assurance that the departmental official would act on behalf of and in the interests of the occupying Indians, and that this would not be another "We'll see what we can do" meeting.

The official arrived at noon, and a meeting was held: in the early afternoon, the Indians left the building.

Although it has been reported that "both sides left optimistic", this is questionable. Both groups are definitely waiting to see what the other will do.

In the words of Lou Cameron, "Many people feel that when we leave the building this morning, it will be over. Well, it won't. This is just the beginning. We are starting to write our own history now."

"This is Indian Land": the occupation of the Indian Affairs offices started with 30 to 40 people. During the first eight hours, almost 500 Indians from the Kenora district spent some time in the offices. Looking down from the second floor "balcony", a lone smile breaks the tense atmosphere that surrounded the Kenora Federal Building Wednesday morning.

Hockey: icy dreamland for the Québécois

By PAUL HOCH

"Hockey has been one of the most positive building blocks of French Canadian life," the old story goes. "It has brought them fame and fortune, given them heroes to identify with, has thereby helped to unite the French as a people and probably intensified the pressures toward Quebec separatism in the process." But, if hockey has united French Canadians, behind what has it united them?

The Montréal Canadiens, for decades the main focus of this rabid French nationalism, have always been owned by Anglophone Canadians. Try as they might, few Québécois could ever mistake such men as Senator Hartland Molson or Seagram's Sam Bronfman for being French patriots. Moreover, although the Montréal team has been totally dominated over the years by its Francophone Hockey heroes, the team still goes by the name 'Canadiens' (in French ads, 'Canadiens'), not 'Québécois'.

Then too the word 'national' in the title National Hockey League has never been entirely clear even to English Canadians, since the league is about five-sixths owned by US millionaires and plays five-sixths of its games in American cities. However, French Canadians can supposedly rejoice that the league headquarters has always been in Montréal.

Obvious reasons for this are that many of the top hockey gladiators have always been French, and the almost wholly Canadian labor pool for the NHL's shows is easier to control out of a Canadian head office. But most important, according to league commissioner Clarence Campbell, a Canadian city provides what he calls a "hospitable climate." This includes, as the patriotically explained, protection from "harassment in the US by various types of Congressional or legislative investigations and so on." The words "so on," according to the Last Post's Nick Auf der Maur, "refers to US anti-trust laws which forbid monopolies."

Furthermore, as one looks at the top personnel of the Canadian extensions of the NHL, one sees an English Canadian commissioner, English Canadian owners, and even an English Canadian head of the players' association (the president of the Ontario Tory party, no less!). The French might be forgiven if, in the light of these facts, they saw their players as part of a new kind of plantation system. American and English Canadian owners at the top and their French hockey heroes at the bottom.

Nevertheless, you say, some of those French Canadian hockey slaves have managed to make themselves a lot of bread. (This applies also to their English Canadian owners, who have not only made far more bread, but have sustained far fewer injuries.) While a few hundred French Canadian players have managed to make themselves sometimes quite healthy livings out of pro hockey, if one looks at the balance of payments as a whole in Montréal, over the past two decades approximately $10,000,000 has been transferred out of the pockets of French Canadian fans and into the pockets of the Molsons and Bronfmans. Montréal's French community certainly won't get rich this way.

But at least it gives them something to look up to, you say? And, it's quite true, that all around Montréal, and Québec generally, there are literally hundreds of thousands of French kids beating each other up to climb the golden ladder that leads to a pro hockey career. The problem is that, at best, only a few hundred will ever make it. For every one who does make it, perhaps 10,000 others will have pretty much wasted their time and often neglected their educations chasing an unreachable dream. Thus, for these kids the channelling of Québécois into pro hockey's penny world of dreams will have helped to perpetuate an inequitable system.

Anyway, those who don't make it can become good hockey fans, cheering on their Francophone heroes. Though pro hockey may have provided an arena in which the French fans could vicariously act out their aggressions against English Canadians by cheering on "their side" and booing les Anglais, it certainly did nothing to deal with the actual grievances that caused such aggressions.

Indeed the average French hockey fan wastes so much time and energy worrying about the exploits of his heroes that he has little time to deal with his own exploitation in his own factory and community. Hence, the gladiator matches of modern professional hockey have become basically a new kind of bread and circuses for the French working population (and the English one too). The passive consumption of hockey spectacles has, basically, helped to teach the fans a passive, consumption-oriented approach to life generally. Hockey fans are unlikely to be found leading revolutions.

It is indeed remarkable how thoroughly and efficiently the French Canadian population has been channelled into hockey, a sport where aspiring professional cattle are bought up for life in their mid-teens and where few, if any, manage to get a university education. One sees few, if any, French Canadians in pro football, a sport requiring a four year apprenticeship on the university farm team. One also sees few, if any, French Canadians in the Olympic sports (track and field, swimming, etc.) and one wonders what Montréal's Francophone population will be getting for their money in Mayor Drapeau's version of the 1976

Games.

Like the blacks in heavy weight boxing champ Jack Johnson's day, they are permitted to cheer for their own group's leading gladiators. But what does this really get them?

Avoid mean snakes, rotten apples, and sound systems you might regret.

We do.

Blues roast hapless Badgers 16-1

Toronto's 16-1 drubbing of the hapless Brock Badgers Wednesday night at Varsity would have been justified had the Badgers appropriately dressed a golden-haired fellow by the name of Custer.

However that was not the case as the Badgers, Ryerson's western counterpart in the OUAA, are used to inglorious thrashings at the hands of the numerous ogres in the league.

Wednesday night served only to accent the infamous question as to the merits of allowing the perennial 'cellar dwellers' to compete against the powerful teams such as Toronto, Western, Waterloo and York.

The formation of a two-tiered league would provide a saner level of competitiveness for all teams concerned. The only loss might be the cessation of the excessive padding of the players' scoring statistics.

Blues did a little cooking Wednesday night, courtesy of the Badgers, as they roasted the beasts over a high heat for sixty minutes, mixing their goals up well amongst the team and occasionally stirring things up with a few spicy checks as they served up a bland hockey 'fixins' for the small crowd on hand at Varsity arena.

The game had aspirations of being more than your everyday shooting gallery. The Blues rattled 78 shots at a slightly puck shy Brock goallending duo. It's always dandy to have a goalie that can step into a game cold, down twelve goals, and hold the fort for only three more.

The Badgers, hoping not to offend their hosts, politely guided the puck in the direction of the Toronto net on eleven occasions, including a token five shots spree in the second period.

It was only because of a misdemeanor by Bill Fifield in the second period that I was forced to soil a fresh sheet of paper that I had for recording the Brock scoring plays. Fifield lost control of the puck rounding his own net and Brock's John McAllister was given credit for the goal (not bad considering that he was forty feet away and skating in the opposite direction)..

The premium of good staging was of upmost importance as the Blues displayed their shiny competence in an artful fashion.

Runkhe continually portrayed an arrogant style sauntering in on the helpless Brock goalie for two goals. A convincing performance was given by Rick Cornacchia as he discordantly reassured the referee that he had in fact just witnessed his goal in the Brock net. The goal was promptly acknowledged by the referee, but it was badly offside.

Lurking in the wings were a host of surprises to add comic relief, while Toronto kept the lid on the pressure throughout the game. Honorable mention must be given to the bump and fall revue of the porous Badger defence and it would be unfair not to mention the skill shown concerning their flawless disappearing act. It was well worth the price of admission.

Fifield procured a goal from an unpredictable fan (no pun intended) in front of a mesmerized Blayne Reynolds in the Brock nets. A three goal night by rookie Doug Herridge once again proved that he is a valuable performer as he continues to play a superlative supporting role in this year's cast.

Don Pagnutti prouetted about and often took up residence in front of the Brock net as if it were his sovereign right, clicking for two goals. Of course all this was savored by the seasoned play of captain Warren Anderson who collected a goal and numerous assists featuring his 'slapshot' with the poise of a stage veteran.

Brock's game plan was easily discernable by even the rankest of analysts. Its limited extent could be summed up as a vain attempt to clear the puck out of their own end. I'm not sure if red or gold stars were awarded for such feats.

At the five minute mark of the first period Chuck Luksa was the first Varsity player to win a goal at the cheap rate of five shots for a quarter. Like good fellows Gord Davies and Al Milnes chipped in to help defray the cost and were subsequently awarded with assists.

Herridge won the next goal on a slow motion effort as the hibernating Badger defence were nowhere to be found. Herridge obviously was enjoying his success and on his next goal went all the way for a 'cupie doll'. Don Pagnutti, not to be outdone, scored with a hard shot from a face off and Fifield dialed correctly on a fluke shot to connect for Toronto's fifth goal. At the end of the first round the score was 5-0. Toronto outshooting Brock 23-3.

Intermission was a time for reflection, once again about the injustices of this mismatch. I shuddered at the thought of covering the Windsor game this Friday. The reason for my dismay was that Brock gained its only victory of the campaign over the lowly Windsor Lancers. It's enough to make you write to the jolly fatman for a pocket talisman.

The second period got underway with four goals scored in less than three minutes. One of these tallies was the unfortunate Brock marker on Fifield's miscue. After hitting the post Mike Lauder finally struck gold, shortly followed by goals from Anderson and Cornacchia.

The remaining goals in the second period were notched by Kent Runkhe, Herridge, John Richmond on a power play goal, Pagnutti again, and a nice goal by Gord Davies who parked long enough in front of the Brock net to bang in an excellent pin-point pass by Anderson. At the end of the second period the score was 13-1, Blues outstriking Brock 32-5.

Changes were in the air for the third period however. Brock coach John Nickerson yanked their starting goalie in favor of an eager Tom Hall. Hall faced twenty-three shots in the last scene and played respectably allowing only three Toronto counters.

Lady Blues bash York 5-3

Athletes complain

By DIANE WARDROPE

On Tuesday night the Lady Blues Ice Hockey team met their opponents at York for an important game. During the regular season both clubs went undefeated.

The ladies play 'international' rules stating that there is no body contact in the game, but it was obvious that neither the referees nor York knew about the rules.

The Blues played a close checking first period. Anna Radecki put one past York at the six minute mark to open the scoring. Lynda Harley made a fine rush down the ice and flipped one high into the top corner of the cage to make it 2-0.

Angela Colms scored when she went behind York's net to pick up a loose puck and swept it in, much to the surprise of York. Maureen Mitchell ended the scoring of the period to put the Blues ahead 4-0.

Excellent goaltending for Toronto by Lou Attallah held off 19 York shots in that first period.

The second period showed scrappy play by both teams. Toronto seemed to be content with sitting on their 4 goal lead until two quick York goals woke the Blues up. Good defensive play and tough forechecking by Toronto stalled York's attack throughout the rest of the game.

Angela Colms came up with goal number two with seconds left to play in the period to put Toronto ahead 5-2 going into the final period.

York was not out of it yet, though.

On a fine passing play, York's Cathy Brown scored making it 5-3.

Some wild coaching tactics by York were displayed when they pulled their goalie with 5 minutes left to play with Toronto short-handed. York had 6 attackers but to no avail.

York tried 36 times to beat Attallah, compared to 25 shots by Toronto. The Blues came away with a 5-3 win, making it an eight game winning streak.

The Blues have a long layoff now, not playing again until the end of January.

Abigail Hoffman and Ken Emer, representing Canadian Olympic athletes at the annual convention of the Canadian Track and Field Association being held in Fredericton this weekend, will ask that no open green space be permanently destroyed in the building of the Olympic Village.

Mayor Jean Drapeau's plan for the Olympic village calls for the surrender of 83 acres of public parkland (Parc Vau) to a private developer.

Volleyball and basketball action abounds

By BOB PRITCHARD

In Division I basketball action, St. Mike's A moved into sole possession of first place with a 79-76 nipping of Sr. Eng, having defeated Meds A earlier in the week. Dziemianezuk led St. Mike's with 22 points. Vic I retained a second place spot by defeating Trin A 80-66. Kastelic led Vic with 21 points, while Foster counted 26 for Trin.

Sr Eng recorded their first two wins of the season by taking Law I 76-50, and hammering Scar 89-45. Gratz had 14 points against the Lawyers. Law I reversed the trend in their next game, taking PHE B 66-55 with the aid of 24 points from Pirie. Lorenz and Poplichak had 17 points each for the losers. UC I got 16 points from Klugman to lead them to a 99-68 trouncing of New A, their third win in four starts. New came back in their next game to hand PHE B their fifth loss. 66-64.

In the A part of the second division, PHE C remained undefeated with a 52-31 victory over Jr Eng, and a 60-40 bouncing of Mgt Stud. For A remained a close second by also winning both their matches, 49-31 over Vic II and 46-34 over UC II.

St. M B lost 40-33 to Mgt Stud, but managed a 50-38 win over Dent A in their next outing. The Dentists lost an earlier contest 41-34 to UC II. In the other game, Jr Eng put down Vic II 49-31.

In the B part of the division, Innis came up with three wins in six days to move into a first place tie. They clobbered Dent B (with whom they are tied) 35-17, stuffed New B 45-17, and then finished with a 45-26 victory over PHE D. Dent B won two out of three, beating PHE D 37-17 and Trin B 45-31.

Pharm A won both of their matches, the first one 43-28 over Meds B and the second 32-28 over Trin B. Andryjowicz had 19 points for the Pharmacists in the first game. Med B notched their first two wins, clipping Law 33-32 by a last second basket, and later handing New B a 43-30 loss. PHE D won the battle of the week's losers, 35-32 over Trin B.

In Interfac volleyball, Scarborough finished their pre-Christmas season undefeated to hold a lone first place position in the first division. Erin I was a close second, losing their only game to Scar. Defending champion Eng I only mustered a fourth place tie, four points behind their fellow Eng II.

In the second division, two preliminary playoff games take place in the first week in the New Year. In one, Erin II and Emman battle to take on St. Mike's.

Maybe the way to change the world is to join a large corporation.

We don't make a lot of noise, but this is where it's happening. You see, a large corporation like Kodak has the resources and the skill to make this world a little more decent place to live. And we intend to do what we can to see that this is exactly what happens.

Take our home city, Toronto, Ontario for example. We cut water pollution in Taddle Creek by using natural bacteria to dispose of unnatural wastes. We cut air pollution by using electromagnetic magnifiers in a new combustible waste disposal facility. And we've been experimenting with film as a way to train both teachers and students — including some students who wouldn't respond to anything else except the glare of bright lights and the magic of Broadway.

And we didn't stop with Toronto. Kodak is involved in 47 countries all over the world. Actively involved.

Why? Because it's good business. Helping to clean Taddle Creek not only benefits society... but helps protect another possible source for the clean water we need to make our film. Our combustible waste disposal facility not only reduces pollution... but just about pays for itself in heat and power production and silver recovery. And distributing camera and film to teachers and students not only helps motivate the children... but helps create a whole new market.

In short, it's simply good business. And we're in business to make a profit. But in furthering our business interests, we also further society's interests.

And that's good. After all, our business depends on society. So we care what happens to it.

This holiday season capture our good deeds on film and help us further society's interests.

Kodak
More than a business.

Evans wants decision from federated colleges

By PAUL McGRATH

The three federated colleges at U of T — St. Michael's, Trinity and Victoria — are worried this week.

University president John Evans has been playing "Let's Make A Deal" with them for the past two months, and according to Rev. John Kelly, president of St. Michael's and one of the four people most involved in negotiating with Evans, a decision is wanted by Friday.

Evans has been asking the colleges a simple but quite intricate question: Will you trade your autonomy for what's behind door number one?

The door in question is Evans' October work paper on the role of the colleges, which proposes extensive shifts in the college system, changes that will substantially change the academic and fiscal responsibilities of the three colleges.

The decision is a tough one for the heads of the colleges, and has the presidents and councils of Victoria, Trinity and St. Michael's quite confused trying to ascertain exactly what lies behind the door.

Evans is asking the somewhat reluctant colleges to take a gamble on a radically different system of dividing the money, curriculum and teaching on the whole campus. Reduced to simplest terms, the process would be one of centralization of budgetary and teaching resources.

The federated colleges are unique. Unlike University, New and Innis colleges, they own their own land, are responsible for their own maintenance and upkeep of buildings.

Most importantly, they retained, after becoming federated to the university, the right to keep separate departments, away from university jurisdiction, in the subjects of French, English, Classics, German and Religious Studies. As a result, they also have the right to hire their own staff to teach these subjects.

This of course necessitates an autonomous budget. All teaching staff at the three colleges are employees of the college, and not the university.

What Evans in his work paper is offering the colleges is something they have been trying to do for years, to expand the courses available to the students in their own college.

Evans' professed purpose in the paper is "to make it possible for most students in the humanities and social sciences to spend a larger part of their initial years, at least, in programs sponsored by the College in which they are registered."

A simple enough goal, that, and one the colleges have been trying to achieve but for lack of space and money.

Evans' means are what disturbs people inside the colleges. They are being asked to trade their right to appoint their own staff, to give up their budgets and to say goodbye to their separate departments in the humanities

Evans envisages university-wide departments in all subjects taught, thereby allowing the university to return to the colleges by cross-appointments in all subjects a larger range of subjects.

"The scope of college programming could include the popular social science courses, many of the 'college subjects, possibly biological science and psychology, possibly tutorials in other subjects as needed."

Evans seems somewhat impatient with the colleges' response. A report from Rev. Kelly of one meeting indicated that Evans was not satisfied with the "negative" responses he had received. Principal Hallett of University College, after considering responses from the combined departments in the college subjects wrote to Evans.

"I have never read such arrant nonsense in my life," he wrote. "The one from the department of French takes first prize for ignorance and stupidity and the one from English runs a close second."

The general air of confusion and reaction over the matter has the colleges in a state of being unable to make the important decision required by Friday.

Rev. Kelly came to a meeting of the College Council at St. Michael's Monday looking for direction to take to the meeting on Friday, but the only motion he could get from the council was one that said in effect: "We need more details and we need more time."

With Evans' determination to go through with his plans this year, time is most definitely running out before the federated colleges are forced into a far less advantageous bargaining position.

"Let's get in on the bottom floor," said Rev. Kelly at the meeting, but a lot of the St. Michael's community see it as getting in on the bottom floor of a chancy numbers game.

Burn down a building, and U of T collects $$$

By MARINA STRAUSS

Along with such hazards as flood, earthquake and war, U of T is also uninsured against "students when protesting against the university", providing the property damaged is not university-owned.

University-owned property is insured under such conditions, as well as "claims arising out of riot, civil commotion or mob action".

This, along with all other clauses of the university's insurance policy is currently being reviewed by the business affairs committee of the Governing Council.

"Probably no other Canadian university has put a clause in its insurance policy about student protests," noted business affairs vice-president Alex Rankin.

"If a student burned down a building for any reason we'd collect," he asserted.

The university's new discipline code, which proposes setting up a tribunal empowered to deal with offenses such as damages due to student demonstrations, will provide a further measure of protection.

Rankin agreed the proposed tribunal would be able to fine a student for damages which the insurance policy does not cover.

The university tribunal would allow the university to collect for damages that otherwise, under its insurance policy, it would have been unable to obtain, claimed former student David Depoe.

The university laid a criminal charge of willful damage against Depoe in 1971 when students, barred from a hearing over the firing of a library worker, smashed a glass door. Depoe was later acquitted in court.

But Toronto lawyer Paul Copeland noted that Depoe's case was the exception — university officials rarely lay criminal charges.

"Students are pretty immune to civil actions," Copeland contended.

He added that even in the 1969 Sir George Williams University occupation in Montreal, where students destroyed the computer centre, the university did not sue anybody civilly, although "a lot of heavy criminal charges were laid."

Copeland did not feel the decision of an internal university tribunal would have any effect on a civil court's ultimate decision.

Demonstrations at U of T have generally been peaceful with no major damages.

In the last year's math department occupation, the student protest over the firing of three professors was "a very peaceful, soft sit-in," according to Steve Salaff, one of the professors whose dismissal precipitated the occupation.

The university abashedly dropped charges it laid on occupiers of Simcoe Hall in the 1972 occupation over library access. The courts found four persons charged with assaulting police guilty, but three were freed with no criminal record and the other person was granted a conditional discharge.

"There was several thousands of dollars of damage done to the Senate chambers," Rankin said. "Tables had to be refinished, the carpet took a beating, the door panel had to be restored."

But the worst damage incurred was the smashed doors of the chamber — and none other than the Metro police were responsible for that.

'Plumbers' may be needed to stop Gov Council leaks

By BOB BETTSON

The Governing Council couldn't decide what to do about the many leaks of confidential documents that have been published in The Varsity this year.

Chairman Malim Harding said there was no easy solution to what he called "breaches of confidentiality". He said there should be further study on the question.

Political Economy Professor H.C. Eastman said he did not blame The Varsity for printing the leaked documents but added "it is extremely important that this practice be stopped."

"We ought to track down these leaks... the executive should ask each member of council if they deliberately released confidential documents," he added.

However Varsity editor Bob Gauthier told the council the grounds for classifying documents as confidential have not been substantiated.

He added once the publication of The Varsity stopped at the beginning of December documents were more readily available. Earlier, Varsity reporters had only been able to obtain documents with a great deal of difficulty.

Academic Affairs chairman John Dove warned that if the leaks continued "many of us might have to decide whether to make personal references if they might be revealed publicly."

The only dissenting note came from faculty member W.B. Coutts who questioned why budget documents should be classified as confidential. "We should drastically reduce the number of confidential documents."

The other leaks which have taken place have been on the part of some of the members to the University of Toronto Faculty Association.

The Varsity has published a number of stories concerning confidential budget reports and submissions to the councils' business affairs and budget committees.

The matter will again be discussed at the next council meeting. No councillor has admitted to allowing the leaks.

No, this student isn't barfing. It's just the drinking fountain on Roberts' 11th floor, inaccessible to people under five feet two inches tall.

Tenure for biology computers?

By SUSANNE FARKAS

Biology 110 is one of a student's few opportunities on campus to have an intimate relationship with a tape recorder.

The full-scale attempt to educate 2,000 students at once by mass multi-media techniques is the reaction to the outcries of the students of the 60's.

Where once the norm consisted of 1,000 students in a class, without tutorials, and a requisite of the course was binoculars—to see the professor—now stands the single student with a made-to-measure course.

Minus the professor, the student is able to control the information to be covered and, if necessary, is able to repeat it.

It is done by dividing all the course into three parts: first, the core—to obtain D one must finish; second, the skill—some optional some not, C-B average; and third advanced topics—a choice of three or a design of the students own subject matter. The core consists of 23 units of basic information which are to be studied in the multi-media lab. It is here, behind each carrel that students can be heard tapping their feet to the beat of a combo band or swaying to a melodious Mozart.

This play is added incentive for students designed to avoid the age-old problem of "lecture lullaby".

Students, however, can still be seen dragging themselves away from the tape room faces heavy with the after lecture tape blues.

The most common complaint which can be heard in the "meeting place," primarily a lounge for Bio 110 students, is the alienation and lack of motivation encountered in this course. Ironically this is precisely what the new course structure was to eliminate.

The co-ordinator of the course, Professor J.B. Smith, obviously foresaw this as a problem and has made potentially good steps to alleviate it.

The first method involved the setting up of the skills and advanced topic in a traditional lecture format. This enables mutual exposure of both student and professor.

The second possibility for the student is in contact with the course advisor, but there are about 200 student to one advisor.

Potentially an effective but unfortunately disappointing solution is the oral evaluation.

The evaluation is set up to test groups of six students orally on their knowledge of the core units, every second week.

The potential lies in the flexibility of these evaluations. They could be used as positively constructive and stimulating tutorials, especially with the personal attention of a six-to-one student-professor ratio.

Unfortunately, only a few take advantage of this aspect of this course.

Learning is best enhanced when there is immediate feedback, in regard to progress, and goals of the course are clearly identified, the manual says.

THE GOVERNING COUNCIL REVIEW OF THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO ACT, 1971

The Committee to Review The University of Toronto Act, 1971 has begun to meet and plans to have its report completed by April 30th, 1974, for transmission to the Governing Council through the Executive Committee. The Committee invites individuals or groups to submit comments or briefs with respect to the Act, such comments or briefs to be directed specifically to the clauses of the 1971 Act, identifying clearly by number the sections to which the comments would apply. Submissions should be directed to the Secretary of the Governing Council, Room 106, Simcoe Hall, to be received no later than February 15th, 1974.

Gov Council puts an end to Food Sciences

By BOB BETTSON

It was one big happy family on December 19 as Governing Council decided without opposing votes to phase out the faculty of food sciences.

The move came despite the pleas of students, faculty and alumni of the faculty to dump the plan for centralization which has been in the works for three years.

The Christmas spirit appeared to have penetrated even student members of the council as they let the administrations patch up recommendations for the phasing-out of the faculty without a phasing-out of the faculty pass without a hint of dissent.

To get around the Lillian Massey will of 1906 which would turn the Massey building over to Victoria College if the teaching of food sciences is abolished, the council agreed to support a "new" household science program.

This plan would abolish the faculty but retain the teaching of food sciences in a new resource centre involving the formation of a new Department of Nutrition and Food Science.

The council also agreed to solve the problem of what will happen to the present teaching staff by relocating them in the "appropriate divisions of the university."

University President John Evans in a glowing press release after the decision said this would permit better instruction to be given at a lower cost by making more effective use of resources in various faculties and divisions of university.

Borrowing big business terminology, Evans told the council "This is a unique concept of pooling resources... it is increasingly clear that a resource entitlement mechanism must be operative (sic).

"The concept of consolidation of resources is important for the university if we are going to change in any way under the present financial constraints. We are combining two departments of sub-optimal size."

Evans called the move the first of many designed to gain flexibility by using the resources of the whole university.

Food Sciences Dean Ira Armstrong said after the meeting that the writing is on the wall for other small faculties and federated colleges of the university.

"They made it clear that it is a pattern to be followed by the Governing Council, if and when they begin on the next small faculty and absorb it into the university."

Academic affairs committee chairman John Dove said the decision was "painful" but necessary. He said he supported the new proposals agreed to at the last planning and resources committee meeting.

"The present faculty should not be based in Food Science because of its isolation and the need for a widened scope in scholarly work and research," he added.

The only opposition came from Professor W B Counts who called the recommendations "haffing." "You are trying to abolish food sciences while pretending not to in order to avoid the question of the present building."

Philosophy professor Chuck Hanly said: "It is clear that these proposals will add to the academic strength of the university in food sciences."

But the students, faculty and alumni spectators had to leave the meeting disappointed in defeat after their long three year battle to survive.

The new Household Science program will be a combination of the old Food Sciences and the nutrition department of the School of Hygiene. Those employees of Food Sciences who will not go to the new school have been offered "positions in appropriate divisions of the University."

Dean Armstrong's warning that the federated colleges are scheduled for integration came before the recent squeeze on the federated colleges to make a decision on proposals by president Evans that would substantially change their role on the campus. She sees the Food Sciences phase-out as just one step in an overall program to centralize the resources of the university.

As a result of the Food Sciences decision, the university may have monetary trouble on its hands. According to the provisions of the founding of the Faculty of Food Sciences in 1907, the university might have to purchase from Victoria College the building that formerly housed the Faculty, a purchase that could cost over $100,000.

Academic Affairs stalled on Forster report

By CHRIS PROBERT

The academic affairs committee bogged down in discussion of various reports of academic subcommittees in its meeting yesterday. Thus, despite Chairman John Dove's desire to tackle the Forster Report on academic appointments, academic affairs made no progress on that document, the most important currently before it.

The first subcommittee to report was the subcommittee on admissions and awards, with its eighth report of the season, a Consideration of the Interim Report of the Committee on Ontario Universities Special Committee on Undergraduate Scholarship Policy. The fifth recommendation of the subcommittee was the only one to stir controversy.

This was a move to condemn so-called 'open-ended' scholarships to first year, and was specifically directed against York University.

In the 1972-3 school year, York inaugurated a policy of automatically offering free tuition for the first year to any student graduating from high-school with an average of 80 per cent or higher.

The phrase 'open-ended' applies because there is no limit to the number of scholarships thus granted. Against York's move it was argued the scholarships were being used as a recruitment device, rather than awards for academic excellence.

Likewise, it was urged by university Provost Don Forster that much of the funding for the open-ended program was coming from monies normally allocated for in-course scholarships.

There was general concern with maintaining some balance between in-course awards and entrance scholarships, to preserve fairness to students already enrolled.

Despite the fact, pointed out by academic affairs faculty member W.B. Dunphy, that any disapproval expressed had no power beyond "moral suasion" York was "censured."

Next, the Report of the Task Force on Education was read by Dr. P. Meincke, calling for the establishment of an "umbrella committee" to coordinate OISE, the College of Education, and the University.

A major aim of the new committee would be to improve the standard of teaching at COE, through cross-appointments with relevant university departments.

There has been growing concern at the lack of linkages between COE and the University.

A proposed amendment by student rep Gord Barnes, calling for two U of T alumnae, presently teachers in Ontario, and two students in education, to be included in the make-up of the new committee, was carried.

The committee dissipated any forward momentum it may have had in the examination of the Report of the Committee to Study Relationships between the Faculty of Music and the Royal Conservatory of Music, presented by Dr. Hamilton, of the latter institution.

In the past, as Don Forster remarked, the U of T has viewed the Gord Barnes, student governor, at yesterday's Academic Affairs' exercise in Taoism.

Conservatory as a "subsidiary business."

However, the RCM's status as a part of U of T would be unique, as most of its teaching is at the university level.

It has, however, 70 advanced students enrolled full-time, for which it is seeking financial support from the Ministry of Colleges and Universities.

There is precedent for such an arrangement. The University of Toronto now receives money for students enrolled at UTS, the report said.

Another concern of the RCM was duplication and indeed conflict between the RCM and the Faculty of Music of U of T in the area of advanced courses.

After three-quarters of an hour, with only two of the RCM committee's specific recommendations discussed, due perhaps to the confused way in which the report was written, Chairman Dove adjourned the discussion on that subject to a future meeting. At this point, the session was closed to outsiders as Provost Forster read his report on Appointments, Status Changes and Resignations.

Athletic report rubber-stamped

The Governing Council again wielded its rubber stamp with a heavy hand at its December meeting as it passed without any discussion athletic priorities previously drawn up by an athletics task force this year.

The proposals, which were arrived at without significant student input placed a heavy stress on integration of athletic facilities for men and women as the top priority for capital expenditures.

They also involve the construction of a field house adjacent to the Benson building, the construction of a weights room in the Benson building, more squash courts, a swimming pool possibly and enclosure of the existing Robert street rink.

Vice-President Jill Conway, in presenting the proposals, stressed the high degree of unanimity in support of the priorities.

She added there had been an unusual amount of community input and support for the project. "We are making fitness and recreation a top priority. This goal can be maintained while continuing our high level of excellence in competition."

Discipline meeting Thursday

It is urgent that all students interested in stopping the discipline code meet at the SAC office at 7 pm on Thursday night to begin a canvas of the campus residences. This is in preparation for the January 24 Governing Council Meeting.

Gaining massive-student support is imperative if we are going to win. So be there!

And Mr. Moses also requests that you keep those cards and letters rolling in to SAC headquarters with your opinions on the discipline code.

Reject the discipline code (I)

When the Governing Council meets January 24 the infamous Cadario-Conway Discipline Code will probably be on the agenda. Students and their supporters must do everything in their power to stop this code before its real implications are felt.

The "Code" serves only to act as a deterrent to any legitimate student protests and should not be accepted by the student body — be it part-time or full-time undergraduate or graduate students — or their allies.

Just as in 1969 the administration must be shown that students will never support attempted suppression of dissent or the imposition of odious academic penalties which only serve to maintain the status quo and hinder any attempts toward progressive change.

First of all, those affected most by the code — students — should realize by now that the administration is in fact attempting to ram through not one code, but two separate codes in the guise of a single proposal — one code for 'academic' offences and one for 'non-academic.'

By combining the two in a pre-Yuletide package the administration had hoped to make its gift more palatable to some students on campus: (after all the present discipline body—the Caput—is worse than the proposed tribunal system). Unfortunately, all of the student organizations — so-called 'legitimate' and 'non-legitimate' — have justifiably seen fit to reject the code. And, in its latest statement on the code, the Students' Administrative Council even went so far as to state that: "The discipline system gives great power to the administration. Because there is evidence of bad faith on their part, students cannot be confident of the fair and impartial administration of justice."

"For this reason, the Discipline Code and proposed structures are fundamentally unacceptable and will not be recognized by the student community at large or its representative organizations."

In fact, even some faculty and administrators have rejected the code. In a letter published in the Varsity, on November 26, Head of Trinity College, Crofton P. Orritt, and four others from the college wrote in part: "Widespread concern has been voiced by a significant number of students from this college regarding the discretionary clauses in the proposed documents, the all-too-apparent movement in contradiction of the spirit of the Campbell Report, and the complete lack of information and consultation which has allowed this code to surface in monolithic form . . . any attempt to implement in whole or in part the new discipline code, would be at this time a disservice to the University community in general, an affront to student representation and the student body, and would subvert the attempt of Trinity College to issue a statement of position."

And such related opposition is sufficient to stop the implementation of the code in the three federated universities and the three federated colleges; for, as the introduction to the code of behaviour (as passed June 21, 1973) notes: "The provisions of the code dealing with non-academic offences will have to be passed by the appropriate bodies in the federated universities and colleges before it will apply to members of those institutions." So there is still time for students and their allies to strike back against the proponents of a code which attempts to stifle and suppress student involvement in decision-making at this university.

The non-academic sections of the proposed code should be rejected outright — they smack of arrogant suppression; the discretionary powers of the administration at Simcoe Hall are too greatly enhanced and centralized, and far too many ambiguities still exist in the code. There should be no discipline code at all. (We will deal with the non-academic sections of the discipline code in future editorials.)

As for the academic half of the 'Code of Behaviour', we do believe that students are entitled to an Academic Protection Document (Bill of Rights), but this 'bill of rights' should not turn out to be a code by any other name.

The present academic sections of the code of behaviour should be scrapped in their entirety and a new students' Academic Protection Document (Bill of Rights) should be created, but only after students are given equal rights with faculty members at this university.

The academic sections of the code as they stand now make far too many wrong assumptions; they assume that the learning process at this university is sufficiently valuable to warrant a code to protect it; it leaves little room for academic flexibility; it preserves the status quo and impedes change; it is a regressive piece of paper.

Until students are given equal rights with faculty there can be no discussion of any similar 'code of behaviour' for both students and faculty (a possibility the administration is now trying to sell to students).

The teaching staff already has its protective clause in the code — the Haist Rules — which applies to tenured faculty members and will, according to the code, be used at the discretion of the administration to avoid "a multiplicity of proceedings with the possibility of added costs and embarrassment for the member concerned." This aspect of the document, we feel, presupposes that faculty are 'more than equal' to students with regard to fundamental academic or human rights. That sentiment is already expressed too often around this university.

However, while the present academic half of the code is unacceptable, students must work for some guarantee of academic rights, as well as the necessary equal sharing of control in the formation of the educational environment.

The Caput, which presently decides discipline penalties, is an unwieldy, unrepresentative, star-chamber-like body. It must not remain. Article 9(1) of the University of Toronto Act (1971) provides that "unless and until otherwise provided by the Governing Council, the councils and the Caput under the University of Toronto Act, 1947 and their respective powers are continued."

Section 81 of the Act specifies that a student will have the right to appeal any punishment awarded against him/her "except in a case of expulsion" . . . but shall have no other right of appeal and the decision of the body exercising disciplinary jurisdiction . . . shall be final and binding and not open to review except by the Board (Governing Council)." This provision, in effect, makes certain appeals dependent upon political decisions by the Governing Council. It's composition includes: the president of the university (as chairman) the principal of University College, the heads of the federated universities, the heads of the federated colleges, the deans of the faculties of the University and the Warden of Hart House."

President Merlin and the Star Chamber, now playing in Simcoe Hall.

The proposal for a discipline code must be defeated and a new students' Academic Bill of Rights must be set up to replace the Caput. Students must act now to let Simcoe Hall know they do not accept the contrived code. The Governing Council meets January 24. We must organize to defeat the code.

Parent of little league hockey player wants improvements at Varsity Arena

The following letter was sent to U of T president John Evans:

I am appealing to you to do something about conditions at Varsity Arena relating to the activities of The Little Toronto Hockey League. The league has use of the arena from six until 11 pm, Saturday evenings.

Well over 400 boys aged six to 14 play on the various teams and there are long waiting lists of others who would like the same privilege. Unfortunately they cannot be accommodated due to lack of facilities and ice time. This is doubly unfortunate because the majority of these youngsters are from poor homes in the central and downtown areas of Toronto.

For those who can be accommodated conditions are deplorable. Lack of dressing room space means youngsters have to change into hockey gear beside urinal troughs in the men's wash room. In some cases mothers are exposed to this as they assist in dressing six year olds.

Some teams do get the use of dressing rooms but the time schedule is so tight it means waiting until a team comes off the ice, gets dressed and leaves, before they can go in. From then until they are due on the ice the time is approximately 10 minutes. Hardly time for a coach to have much contact with his team, which in most cases he sees once a week.

It is important for these volunteer coaches to have time with their boys, not only to prepare them for their games but to give direction in other ways. Many of the youngsters have problems and sometimes it is easier to talk about them with another adult they trust than with a parent.

League officials are under tremendous pressure because of the situation. This was further aggravated not long ago when the arena took away the office assigned the league for many years.

Arena officials left them a space about the size of a skimpy clothes closet where league files are kept. The business of running the league has to be done in the arena hallway.

Not only is the league strapped for space, but time as well. In order to get in all the games in the five hour period and allow for time to flood the ice, each game can only last 28 minutes. Yet these youngsters pay 50 cents admission each time they come.

Admittedly, some families can well afford the 50 cents, but many cannot.

I understand, Dr. Evans, it is university policy to assist youngsters in athletics so what can be done to help this league.

Incidentally, this league has been in existence for about as long as Varsity Arena has been standing which I understand is at least 50 years. So, it is not a new relationship by any means.

My reason for writing you, Dr. Evans, is that I am a concerned parent. I have two boys who play in the league, one seven and the other 11. Naturally, I want things to be better for them but I am more concerned about the hundreds of youngsters who are less fortunate than mine.

Please. Will you help?

Southern Africa: fact and fiction

The liberal press feels obligated to publish a wide range of opinion. But lies in the guise of opinion are not worthy of print. For example, The Varsity, Wednesday, December 5, 1973, page 5 printed:

Mulder: "There is no racial discrimination in South Africa."

Fact: Blacks and Whites are forbidden to intermarry; Blacks and Whites are forbidden to drink tea together without special permit; Blacks and Whites in every sphere of life must use separate and unequal facilities.

Vorster: "Separate development is not only accepted by the Whites but by all the races in South Africa. It is a policy that is morally right."

Fact: Thousands of Blacks and even some Whites have been jailed in South Africa for protesting the policy of separate development.

Smith: "We have always had majority rule in Rhodesia."

Fact: The United Nations has imposed sanctions on Rhodesia's 255,000 Whites specifically because they have refused to allow majority rule to 5,310,000 Blacks. Smith has also said, "If we ever have an African majority government in this country, we will have failed in our policy... Our policy is one of trying to make a place for the white man."

Mulder: "South Africa is a country where democracy is being practised in the full sense of the word."

Fact: One fifth of the population (the whites) control the entire political system of the country. All Africans must carry pass books and produce them on demand. Over 3,000 Africans are arrested every day for pass book offenses.

Hull: "Apartheid, or more correctly separate development, is a uniquely South African solution to a uniquely South African situation."

Fact: A racist policy of separate development has been attempted by every capitalist colonialist regime from Britain to the United States.

Hull: "The South African government... can formalize the existing situation of racial separation, and attempt to do so in a manner ensuring harmony between the racial groups and justice towards all."

Fact: Since the killing of 69 peaceful demonstrators in Sharpeville in 1959, hundreds of Blacks have been arrested, tortured (reported by the Rand Daily Mail) and left to rot in the prison camp on Robben Island without trial.

Hull: "This policy recognizes the right to self-determination of the several Bantu peoples, and provides them with means to full self-determination."

Fact: Four fifths of the population (the Blacks) have been allocated one fifteenth of the most arid land in South Africa to develop their "separate nations" under the scrutiny of white "advisors."

Hull: "...apartheid is not in any way shape or form, overtly or covertly, an attempt to legislatively entrench white racial supremacy or economic domination of the other races."

Fact: As of 1968, per capita income: Whites $3,144.00 Blacks $117.00. Average wage in mining: Whites $4,740.00, Blacks $285.00. Ages subject to tax: Whites 21-60, Blacks 18-65. Income exempt from tax: Whites $840.00, Blacks none. Education expenditure per pupil: Whites $159.00, Blacks $18.00. Infant mortality per 1,000 births: Whites 27, Blacks 200. Employment: No African may occupy a position senior to any white in a company. Africans may never give orders to whites.

Hull: "Looking at the majority of African states we see the results of underdeveloped peoples suddenly and without adequate preparation, having the responsibility of governing a country thrust upon them. It is not a pretty picture."

Fact: Since 1952 there have been 21 military coups on the African continent engineered by the United States and western Europe in order to further their neo-colonialist goals of extracting raw materials from African nations.

Hull: "...the government has made great and sincere efforts to assist this development, spending literally hundreds of millions of dollars on economic assistance to the Bantu".

Fact: In 1960 the South African government spent $50 million on police, in 1968 it spent $120 million on police. In 1960 the South African government spent $61 million on defense, in 1968 it spent $356 million on defense.

Hull: "South Africa's blacks are wealthier, better educated, healthier, by far than any of their fellow blacks on the African continent."

Fact: In 1972 South Africa's Blacks although they constitute 80 per cent of the population receive only 18.8 per cent of the nation's cash income. In 1971, per 100,000 people, tuberculosis rates were: Africans 461, coloured 437, Asians 205, and whites 35. Kwashiorkor (protein deficiency), per 100,000 people, in 1965: Africans 980, coloured 410, Asians 40, and whites - none.

Facts are easy enough to find to defeat the nauseous propaganda of Mr. Hull. But why does the debate continue at all in Canada? The answer is simple. Canada benefits from the existing oppressive system in southern Africa. Our government and corporations invest heavily in southern Africa and they reap substantial profits from the cheap labour economy. The important question to ask ourselves when reading Hull and his ilk is just who are they supporting? Are they concerned with the development of all the people in southern Africa? Or are they really interested in supporting the ruling white elite in southern Africa and Canada?

GAA into home stretch, applies for certification soon

It's been a long haul for the Graduate Assistants Association, but the GAA is now into the home stretch before it applies for certification, possibly later this month.

A mass mailing was sent out to all graduate assistants last week not signed up with the GAA which has been organizing to form what they hope will be the first union of teaching assistants in Canada.

To date, almost 800 have signed up and GAA organizers want more to ensure immediate certification of the GAA as bargaining agent. Certification requires 35 per cent of the assistants eligible to join.

Just how many assistants there are at U of T appears to be an unclear point. After a lengthy effort last term, the university administration released its master list of all assistants at U of T.

The problem is, however, the list is actually two lists and the actual number of assistants could range from 2,000 to 2,400.

The confusion is courtesy of the university's computer which has to read out two codes to get all the assistants

Code 14 includes all graduate students who are teaching assistants, and code 15 lists non-graduate assistants such as doctors employed by the Faculty of Medicine.

The codes are not consistent, and grad students appear on both lists.

Meanwhile the GAA's efforts to get back vacation pay are still going forward. While the provincial government has ruled assistants are eligible for vacation pay, the government said U of T already gives paid vacations to its assistants.

The GAA has appealed that ruling and is awaiting the final word from the provincial labor department.

Canned honors program rears its ugly head again

By MIKE EDWARDS

In November 1968, the Faculty of Arts and Science decided to forgo the Honors program of study at U of T. Amid protest that the University's world reputation was based on the quality of its honors program, the Faculty Council General Committee voted 55-45 to abolish the distinction between an Honors and a general academic program.

During Monday's meeting of the same general committee, attempts were made to reintroduce the concept of an Honors program. However, most supporters of such a move had to contend with an evening of faulty logic, self-contradictory arguments, and the usual amount of double-talk.

The centre of debate was recommendation 40 of the ubiquitous Report of the Committee to Implement the Berlyne Report.

The recommendation brings in the concept of "honors" which would be awarded post facto, provided the student followed the recommendations of his/her department and snagged an A average.

According to Dean Joan Foley, chairwoman of the Implementation Committee, it was decided it was necessary to award "recognition for the student's meeting intellectual challenge both in and out of approved programmes."

The logical obscurity of the argument began revealing itself when someone asked why a student would have to apply to the department before proceeding with the getting-of-A's—why not simply recognize academic excellence?

Dean Foley quickly countered saying a department may have courses open only to Honors students and thus the students should declare themselves.

Besides, she added, "It is the simplest way to detect candidates".

However, this opened the door to other criticisms. Professor Slater spoke of the basic confusion of the debate.

He said: "This is an Honors program, but the candidate can only get the Honors degree if he gets A's". He called for a return to the Honors program or a simple recognition of academic excellence (i.e. marks).

Student representative Bob Bettson from Innis College decided to put a cap on the debate and on the evening with a short speech attacking the concept of the Honors program. "Students are opposed to the concept of so-called academic standards imposed from atop. The academic standards committee (of the faculty council) is the most undemocratic body in the university".

Further debate on the issue will be forthcoming. The Faculty have been given another chance to think up some excuses for the return to an Honors program, which was scrapped in 1968 because it created a false dichotomy among students of equal abilities.

In other business before the general committee, a report was tabled indicating there are 218 more full-time Arts and Science students on the St. George campus than had been forecast.

Dean Foulds secretary of the committee announced that, as of Dec. 1, 1973, there were 9,718 such students at U of T.

Also the new principal of the yet to be named College X was announced.

Arthur Kruger, a professor of Economics and a well-known arbitrator in labor disputes was handed the job as of Jan. 1.

College X, another recommendation of the Berlyne Report, is a college that caters to the needs of part-time students, but on an equal basis with other colleges.

Evans' centralism brings reaction, confusion

By PAUL McGRATH

U of T president John Evans' work paper on the role of the federated colleges reveals quite a bit of Evans' intentions for the university over the next few years, but it hides more than it reveals about the reasons for the new approach.

The rational for Evans' proposals are certainly more complicated than that expressed in the document.

It is not surprise to anyone that the university is undergoing far greater only 50 per cent of the total possible grant available for every student enrolled fully in the federated colleges.

For every student enrolled in a federated college that takes a course outside that is, in noncollege subjects such as History and Political Science) a complex internal formula is required to ascertain who owes how much and why.

With the new university-side departments, the university could

The inequalities within the college system are not mythology, however.

It is likely that Evans sees in the federated colleges a sort of academic community that he would like to see spread out over the campus.

He has acknowledged in negotiations between the colleges that he feels there is not a suitable academic environment in New and Innis colleges, and that his plans of spreading all the possible subjects into all the colleges would alleviate this, as well as break the hegemony that University College holds among the constituent colleges.

With the new role as a broader academic community, Evans would expect each college to engage in more intensive academic counselling and to "facilitate informal interaction between students and professors."

Although it does not appear that the federated colleges want to opt out of Evans' plans, they are a little put off by his desire that they move on the subject quickly.

The colleges have had two months since the release of the paper to contemplate extremely radical changes to their entire constitution, and St. Michael's, most prominently, wants more time to study Evans' policy, and to obtain more detail as to their exact position under the new college system.

Reactions at St. Michael's range from the "let's gamble" approach of Rev. Kelly, to an outright mistrust of Evans' sincerity, with a light topping of Catholic xenophobia.

When Evans' paper was released, the colleges were asked to respond and comment on it, with no notion that action was to be taken for some time.

Yet Evans' work paper is not the first on the subject; Centralization has been in the air for 14 years, since the Woodside Memorandum in 1959 said that the necessary "first step is to combine the present College departments, except Religion, into University departments."

The fears expressed by members of the St. Michael's College Council relate for the most part to safeguarding the variety and uniqueness that they see possible within the federated college system.

Evans' promise of rehiring all teaching staff and cross-appointing them back into St. Michael's doesn't quite convince them that the plan is an adequate alternative to the close community they feel is present.

Much of the sentiment revolves around this question: Would a professor hired by the university to work at St. Michael's feel more tied to the university or to St. Michael's? Simply enough, will Evans' proposals actually improve student-faculty feelings about a college or render the college system meaningless by co-opting a professor's loyalty?

This feeling was echoed in a confidential response to Evans' paper by the three heads of the colleges Kelly for St. Michael's, Goldwyn French for Victoria and George Ignatieff for Trinity.

The confidentiality of this document angered some members of the quite meaningless, the Colleges' academic role."

One of the major objections was that the three heads did not quite see the necessity of the concept of a university department for the college subjects, preferring to allow the disciplines to work out their own structures as suited them best.

They also wanted to ensure that the executive of the central department would be limited so that "they should not have authority to transfer an individual from one college to another without his agreement and the consent of the college."

This is likely the major concern of the colleges. Quite accustomed to hiring and promoting staff to their own separate criteria, they are reluctant to turn that power over to a larger organization that is attempting to consider five other colleges at the same time.

financial strain than at any time in previous history.

The university's ability to expand both geographically and in the areas of research and specialization have been badly curtailed by the provincial government's educational thrift.

Bringing the federated colleges fully into the university would bring an end to the complex accounting necessary to balance the books every year, and would put an end to the government discrimination against religiously-affiliated colleges.

At present, the university receives truthfully say that it is doing all the teaching, and thereby receive full grants from the government.

What Evans sees in front of him is a somewhat less than tidy ship, too spread out, with duplications that are more than possible.

The government's stinginess is liable to change if Evans can present them with a cleaner, more quantifiable entity, a simpler budget, and a willingness to do his damndest to centralize into clear lines all the variety that exists on the campus.

Evans the technocrat is only half-concealed behind his stance as Evans the fatherly president worried about his undergraduates.

colleges who felt that on matters of such importance, anything short of openness was destructive.

Although the three heads agreed with the principles of the work paper, they had reservations "about certain aspects of the proposed mechanisms, which we believe would work against the educational goals by diminishing, if not making

Whatever the differences between the many positions on the matter, most parties feel they are not unresolvable. Evans' view of the colleges as more thriving academic communities is one that the federated colleges are interested in, but what they are willing to trade for this end is a matter that apparently they want more time to decide.

Divide and conquer: the Just Society's new Indian policy adapted from the chevron

The question of Indian peoples' status in Canadian society—an issue which has been simmering beneath the calm and indifferent surface of Canadian politics for decades—is slowly but inevitably moving toward some form of resolution as several legal battles are building toward a climax in the courts and the upper levels of Canadian government.

Growing with the surge of legal action concerning native peoples' rights is an assertive and often militant group of movements on the Indian reserves. But, as with the Indian movements in the United States, the militant and publicly visible groups do not always represent the legal, elected Indian leadership, and their impact is diffused.

Status of Indian women challenged

Nowhere is this difference more open than in the legal battle now raging over the status of Indian women. The issue has been pushed into public controversy with the four-year court battle over one Indian woman's legal status which reached the Supreme Court of Canada on August 27 last year.

In a five-to-four decision, the Supreme Court ruled against Jeanette Lavell, an Indian woman who was dismissed from her reservation and deprived of her status as a registered Indian.

The loss of her Indian rights is based on a section of the Indian Act which states that an Indian woman who marries a non-registered Indian—or a non-Indian—loses her status as an Indian and is not entitled to any of the benefits of the Indian Act, including living on the reserve or inheriting property on the reserve.

The section of the Act in question is clearly discriminatory on a sexist basis: an Indian man who marries a white woman loses none of his rights and, in fact, his non-Indian wife acquires all the rights of a status Indian.

Recommendation 106 of the Royal Commission Report on the Status of Women dealt with this discriminatory law:

"... the Indian Act (should) be amended to allow an Indian woman upon marriage to a non-Indian to (a) retain her Indian status and (b) transmit her Indian status to her children."

Clearly, the section violates the Canadian Bill of Rights, which prohibits discrimination "by reasons of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex."

But the Supreme Court placed the Bill of Rights in its real perspective when it allowed that the Indian Act might be discriminatory and in violation of the Bill of Rights, but refused to overturn the section.

The reason? Under law, the Bill of Rights cannot take precedence over any act of Parliament simply because that act is found to be discriminatory. Since the terms of the Indian Act were set down in the British North America Act, the court ruled that it cannot change those terms, discriminatory or not.

This decision has impact far beyond one section of the Indian Act; a case which originally involved the rights of non-status Indian women now affects the rights of every person in Canada, and, as will be explained, the entire native rights movement. In effect, it states that the Canadian Bill of Rights is useless in protecting an individual from discrimination within the law.

The Indian Act is one loophole in the Bill of Rights; there is no way of knowing how many others exist until test cases reach the Supreme Court.

Since the Supreme Court is the highest court in Canada, Lavell has no other possibility of appeal. But action is being taken, by government and on reserves.

Protest over Bill of Rights

Monday, October 22, was declared a Day of Mourning for the Bill of Rights. Women's and human rights organizations marched silently, and in mourning clothes, from noon to 2 pm in front of major federal government buildings across Canada. In Ottawa, the Parliament buildings were the site of the march.

Telegrams have been sent to Parliament members and the prime ministers from various groups, urging that Parliament take up the issue, and to ensure the supremacy of the Bill of Rights over all federal legislation as respects discrimination in regard to race, national origin, colour, religion or sex.

Indian groups are drastically split over the decision. Caughnawaga reserve, near Montreal, has been the site of violent disturbances as police cars have been overturned and police injured when they were called to the reserve to quell a group of Indians who had "evicted" non-Indians.

Members of the militant Warrior Society went through the 5,000 member community and ordered non-Indians off the reserve. The elected band council, provided for by the Indian Act and recognized by the federal government, received approval last September to pass a by-law evicting non-Indians.

Most reserves are not so militant; they are waiting to see what the government will do. And, they are divided on how court cases based on discrimination will affect their special status under Canadian law, protected now by the Indian Act.

The real status of an Indian in Canada is still legally fuzzy, but it is clear that the Indian Act grants Indians special rights not afforded Canadian citizens in general, i.e. living on reserves, cash payments, medical payments, educational aid, etc.

Many Indians fear that, if they are judged according to the Bill of Rights—that is, standard Canadian law—then they will, in effect, lose their special status and become just Canadian citizens—thereby forfeiting all the special concessions given them in the Indian Act.

Other Indians simply who marry outside the band and feel they deserve to be treated as Canadians.

Most band councils pursued the matter even though it meant a pathy with the Indian government will dissolve. A proposal to do just that was put forward by the federal government years ago, but it died of overwhelming objection.

The Indian Act, it is "hold" the natives have regards to special rights. It has been historically granted concessions—payment of mineral rights—would be another part of Canada's no lever on the government.

Most militant Indians are frustrated that the government off the Bill of Rights and split the Indian Rights camps.

At a council of war in spring, in fact, two Mic said that, while they were against the Lavell ruling so because it would split the tribes. They said it was only Caughnawaga reserve tribes which were making while most other tribes

Indian Act divides peoples

The problem is complex. The Indian Act is a maze of definitions describing who is and who is not an Indian, setting out all sorts of puzzling rules involving living on the reserve and whom one marries.

Section 12(1)(b) states that an Indian woman who marries a person who is not an Indian is not entitled to be registered. But the term, "Indian" in the context of the Act, remains today a legal abstraction as set down by white government lawyers. It is not a racial definition: a fullblooded racial Indian, if he is not "registered", is not legally an Indian, no matter who his parents and ancestors and culture are. By the same token, a person can theoretically not have a drop of Indian blood and still meet the legalistic requirements of the Indian Act.

A man may marry anyone he wants without jeopardizing his rights under the Act. And his non-Indian wife may become registered and magically become a legal "Indian."

The Act is explicit about what happens to an Indian woman who marries a non-Indian. The Minister of Indian Affairs, upon receiving a report that an Indian woman has married a non-Indian, may then declare that woman and all her children "enfranchised" as of the date of her marriage.

"Enfranchisement" is a tricky word here, particularly the way it is used in the Indian Act. It sounds good; it implies that the Indian will no longer suffer any legal disabilities, which is technically true. But what it also, in fact, means is that the Indian woman loses those few privileges that belong to "Indians".

Jeanette Lavell, after marrying a white man, decided that despite what the Registrar General of the Department of Indian Affairs thought, she is still an Indian. She appealed the decision to the courts. The first decision held that there was no conflict between the Bill of Rights and the Indian Act. She appealed again, and got lucky.

Justice Thurlow of the federal court held that the section enfranchising women infringed on the right of an individual woman to equality before the law with other Indians. He went on to say that the consequences of the woman's marriage to a non-Indian were no worse than a man's marriage to a non-Indian, which offended the woman's right to equality before the law.

The Bill of Rights, he said, rendered the involuntary enfranchisement sections inoperative. The federal government appealed Justice Thurlow's decision, which led to the Supreme Court's reversal of his decision this August.

Government attempts to confuse Indians

The patent absurdity of the government's stand has led many Indian and non-Indian women's groups to openly oppose the court's decision, and Lavell has become one of the chief organizers of the fight, including October's "Day of Mourning" for the Bill of Rights.

The government appears to be using the Lavell case as a wedge by which to split Indian movements, and if this is the case it is being successful. The official native organizations—composed mostly of men naturally—officially intervened in the Lavell case to oppose any changes in the Indian Act.

Even while the Lavell case was being appealed, the federal government had commissioned the official native organizations to re-draft the Indian Act, in the event the Supreme Court's decision went against the government.

In order to understand the interlocking and coercive nature of that relationship, it must be realized that the federal government also directly funds the native organization.

The logical end-of the government's action seems to be the continuing dwindling of the number of "legal" Indians, who would fall under the provisions of the Indian Act. Indian groups are beginning to win more and more court cases awarding Indian bands money for mineral and land rights; in addition, many Indian groups are posing serious court challenges to federal and provincial governments about the use of the land.

Cree Indians and Inuit Eskimos are now in the process of challenging the use of "their" lands for the building of the controversial James Bay Development project. The native peoples claim they've never given up the title to the land on which the project is being constructed. Their court battle is against the provincial government, a battle which they are carrying out in conjunction with environmentalists, human rights groups and others. Legally, it is the federal government's place to intervene on behalf of the native peoples, but it has refused to do so.

Secret correspondence which was "liberated" during an Indian occupation of federal buildings in Ottawa shows that the cabinet was prepared at one point to directly intervene on behalf of the native peoples, but backed down under pressure from the Bourassa government in Quebec. The project soon became a political trading-game, with the federal government playing off a deep-sea port as part of the project in return for soft-peddling its objections on behalf of the natives.

The same set of documents clearly shows that the federal government wants to settle native land claims without resorting to the courts, apparently because court settlements would imply that the native people have legal rights, rather than being dependent upon "benevolent" concessions from the Canadian government.

The documents show that Indian Affairs' Minister Jean Chretien proposed the federal government settle with the native people at a cost of more than three billion dollars and many millions of acres of land, an offer which would appear publicly to be generous, but which is in reality much less than the land value if sold on the open market.

Chretien's proposal is similar to a settlement the US government made in 1971 to Alaska Indians, and which most Indian spokesmen consider a rip-off. The relatively large amount of money made big headlines in liberal newspapers, but the payoff was not based on actual land value, which would have been paid had some international speculating company held the land titles rather than Indians. The Indians accepted what they figured the US congress would pay, and they gave up all land rights in return for some land and villages, cash settlements and very low mineral rights.

Government wants out-of-court settlements

The federal government in Canada has been trying very hard to keep the native cases out of court lest the natives get a foothold via a precedent, thus allowing all Indians access to full land rights. Therefore, the government has been eager to discuss cash and land settlements and keep them within the status of the Indian Act.

Seen in the context of the interwoven web of government policies and stratagems aimed at keeping the Indian peoples under firm control of the government and keeping the lid on the boiling issue of native legal rights to their land, the Jeanette Lavell case changes meaning.

What appears at first — and if you simply read the accounts of the issue in the daily newspapers — to be a relatively simple case of sexual discrimination becomes a complex and insidious design by the federal and provincial governments to keep the Indian movements off balance and divided so that the true significance of the Indian Act will remain legally clouded and out of public notice.

Toronto Islanders will fight eviction decision

The 150th anniversary of continuous settlement on the Toronto Islands will be celebrated in 1975, or will be if any one is still there.

Metro Council voted 20-12 December 12 to remove the remaining 254 residences which occupy about 19 acres on Ward's and Algonquin Islands.

All are to be demolished by August unless there is an unlikely last-minute reprieve.

The dispute over the reversion to the city of the residential portion of the islands has developed into a very definite city-borough split.

The decision is a reflection of the changed "balance of power" on Metro Council. Where the city once was all-powerful, the boroughs have taken over.

Many more issues will undoubtedly come up which will show the same voting pattern.

In the interests of progressive decision-making, perhaps the Islands problem is one on which some sort of amicable compromise might be reached.

Whatever happens, Island residents are not prepared to take the Metro decision sitting down.

According to Bob Kotyk, spokesman for the Toronto Islands Residents, Islanders are "ready to lie down in front of the bulldozers, if and when they come."

There is also a possibility help may be available from non-Island residents.

Kotyk says the Residents' Association is considering establishing contacts with other community groups or ratepayers associations which have faced or are facing similar problems within both the city and boroughs.

Comparing notes on successes or failures could prove beneficial to islander strategy.

Even if the Island residences are demolished not all of the Islands will be open to the public (taxpayers).

Private yacht clubs currently lease 33 acres (compared with 19 acres for residences) for the exclusive use of their members.

While visitors can stroll along the residential streets on Wards and Algonquin Islands, "fences and signs saying 'MEMBERS ONLY' prevent park users from 'trespassing' onto the land leased by the yacht clubs" according to a city report.

After residents are moved out, the Queen City Yacht Club will take over the area now covered by the houses on Nottawa St., Algonquin Island, which will approximately double the club's existing lease of 2.6 acres.

This land is leased and will be until 1980 for $420 per acre per year plus $1.50 per foot of mooring space which makes an annual total of $920 per acre.

On the other hand, the cost of an annual lease to residents comes to slightly more than $2300 per acre.

That peerless group of American Commie-chasers, the Senate internal security subcommittee, has located a vast conspiracy to undermine the morals of the youth of the Great Republic.

More than 5 billion marijuana and hash cigarettes were imported into the US last year, says Senator James Eastland, subcommittee chairman.

Indicating a conservative calculation, the senator said marijuana consumption in the US reached 17 million pounds, and hash consumption reached about 500,000 pounds.

With typical down-home wisdom, the Mississippi Democrat warned about a "growing body of scientific data" which indicatex marijuana "can do serious genetic damage to future generations."

This conspiracy is so widespread only 10 per cent of the illicit trade is seized by authorities. Heavens to Hashish! Elliot Ness, where are you?

"THE LAST NAIL IN THE COUNTER CULTURE COFFIN."

Jean: It was in "The Varsity" at U. of T. who wrote that about your "virginal player" ad last year. Your approach really rattled him!

Mike: He wasn't the only one! Still, it's a pity he couldn't reach a phone and check it out. My number was right in the ad.

Jean: But what's the point of writing an ad that isn't self-explanatory?

Mike: None—if you have a neat little parcel to sell and a clearly-defined market in which to sell it. We don't. We have a job to do which cannot be simply explained until a person has some background knowledge in it. So we tried to sell the atmosphere instead.

Jean: Well—tell me now—what positions were you filling?

Mike: Alright. We were looking for!

Jean: But surely you need a degree in to do that?

Mike: Not at all. Last year, as a result of our university recruiting for this job, we hired graduates in Geography, Mathematics, Fine Arts, Philosophy and Spanish—among others.

Jean: All for the same job?

Mike: Right.

Jean: But how do they get the technical knowledge for the job?

Mike: Everybody starts by going through a 3½ month training course. Once they get through that the rest of their learning is on-the-job.

Jean: I see. Tell me—just as a matter of interest—did you get any virginal players last year?

Mike: Yes, I did get a call from one. She could not bring her virginal with her so she asked if a simple recorder would do.

Jean: She brought her recorder to the interview?

Mike: That's right—and played an Elizabethan air for me.

Jean: Do you watch Monty Python?

Mike: What's that got to do with it?

Jean: Nothing much...it's just that...hey, you've censored those words that described the job!

Mike: What words?

Jean: Those back up there—earlier in this interview...(There is a shot from OFF RIGHT. Jean slumps forward, her face in a bowl of gazpacho soup.)

'Can't be both a woman and a good writer'

Sexism still prevails in writing, says Atwood

By MARILYN EMERSON

Talking about her experiences as a woman writer, Margaret Atwood told a Toronto audience: "You can't be both a woman and a good writer."

Atwood was part of a discussion on women in the press and sexism held during the Canadian University Press conference at Ryerson Polytechnical Institute last month.

Atwood opened discussion by saying why she did not go into journalism.

An uncle advised her many years ago that women in newspapers wind up either on the women's page or writing obituaries.

Atwood admitted things have changed since then. She cited the political reporter, Rosemary Spiers, of the Toronto Star as an example.

Nevertheless, Atwood feels sexist attitudes prevail in journalism. Attesting to this she described two types of interviews she has experienced in which the writing of females is regarded either as a hobby or a threat.

The first type of interview (predominantly in Western Canada she said) is conducted by a female reporter sent out usually from the women's section of a newspaper.

The reporter asks: "What's your favourite recipe? Are you married? and, do you have any children?"

Atwood said she fails to see what this has to do with writing. This type of questioning, she believes, reveals an attitude toward the female of "housewife first and writer second."

"It assumes creativity is done in off hours. The importance of a work commitment is not taken into consideration."

The second type of interview is conducted by a male who feels the female writer "is dangerous to men." He sees the female writer as a threat. "It's a fear response" said Atwood. "Women may have talent but are cursed."

She talked about sexism in book reviews. "Woman writers are called housewives if they are bad and honorary men if they are good," she said.

She recalled one review where the reviewer said: "She (Atwood) thinks like a man; hard, mean and vicious."

In literature femaleness is looked upon as something to be overcome while maleness is looked upon as a quality deficient in the work of a bad male writer.

Atwood said: "A woman writer is still looked upon as a freak. A good woman writer is looked upon as an exception."

The assumption of artistic creation coming out of pain and suffering only is especially true for women, she said.

But unlike in male writing, pain and suffering in female writing is allowed a cosmic significance.

It is supposed that pain and suffering in male writing reflects "the human condition. Whatever that is," Atwood added.

But pain and suffering in female writing is looked upon as confessional. The assumption is that it reflects an individual and personal condition. It is perverse.

Atwood attacked the sexist content in the question posed by a male: "Why aren't women writing for impoverished women who need to be educated?"

She said the question takes for granted that if a female is going to write at all, she must write for other females, and moreover, for impoverished females who are, on the whole, not interested in reading. "How are you going to make someone interested in reading?" she asked.

Atwood suggested: "If you want to see if things are changing look at popular magazine romance stories." It is this type of literature in which real social change is mirrored.

It used to be the heroine of popular romance, indulging in illicit sex, was punished. Her mother would die or her child would be taken away. But popular romance stories have changed. Some now have happy endings.

Atwood said men's magazines have not changed though. They still portray pleasure and violence — the vampire at the throat of a voluptuous, helpless female.

Responding to an accusation of being a middle class writer, Atwood admitted she had tried writing popular romance but "couldn't handle it." She said it requires a highly stylized type of writing and not anyone can accomplish it.

She considers the publishing stage of writing a relatively easy one for females. Publishers want to make money. They are usually amiable.

A more important aspect of writing, she said, is reviewing. Here one can see the social ramifications of publishing in the "image making" function of reviews.

Highlighting a discussion on images, Atwood issued forth a plea that no one do another poster of her in pink.

Imperial Optical control shattered

Imperial Optical Company's control of the licensing of opticians in Ontario has been shattered by a decision by the Ontario government which eliminated four of the five Imperial representatives on the five-man Board of Ophthalmic Dispensers.

The board had been controlled since its 1961 inception by Imperial-affiliated members only. U of T Governing Council member Sydney Hermant controls, directly or indirectly, Imperial Optical and its more than 300 subsidiaries.

The lone Imperial representative on the board is now Edward Brook, of Braddock Optical Co. Ltd. So far, the Davis government has appointed two independent opticians and is to announce the appointment of two lay persons at a future date.

Keeping a stiff upper lip about it all, former board member William Davies of Hamilton said: "I don't have any quarrel with any of the appointments. I wish them well."

Albert Roy, Liberal MPP for Ottawa East, said in the legislature it was a conflict of interest to have representatives of Imperial solely on the board which is supposed to supervise, train, licence and discipline opticians.

The Varsity was among newspapers which ran feature stories about the control of Imperial over Ontario's glasses-making industry.

One of the new board members, James McLean, told of what it has been like with the Imperial-dominated board.

He said he had many prospective employees refuse to work for him because they feared for their licences because McLean's business was not Imperial-affiliated.

McLean added technicians who were studying up to become full opticians while working for an independent firm frequently failed their exams when they felt they ought to have passed them.

McLean said those persons would be "better off working for Imperial then for me" in their last year of their course.

The 28-year-old optical outlet owner said he wants "to do the job properly and set a few things straight."

Don Ivey's move to stall complete integration of the School of Physical and Health Education with the athletic departments and the athletic associations was soundly defeated 8-3 at yesterday's men's Athletic

The report of the Task Force on New Athletic Facilities had posed two alternative structures. Model One proposed a two-unit body with one unit handling all recreational and athletic activities, and the other the education or school function. Model Two, recommended by the Task Force, proposed complete integration.

Ivey's motion stated: "That the Athletic Directorate go on record at this point in time as not supporting complete integration with the School of Physical and Health Education as proposed in Model 2 of the report . . . and therefore supports Model 1 in principle although not necessarily in detail."

Ivey's arguments failed to make any positive points in favor of holding off on complete integration. As he himself admitted, he was basically in favor of an evolutionary change leading eventually to full integration instead of a 'revolutionary' switch now.

Student representative Roger Wright countered this by reminding the Directorate that even though its decision would only be a recommendation to the Governing Council, such a delay might take a long time to reverse, and there would be no reason to suppose that complete integration would result.

Professor Juri Daniel, Director of the School of Physical and Health Education, argued most strongly in favor of total integration now. He referred to several studies recommending a unified model, including ones from Queen's, York, and Western. Almost all Ontario universities have found the unified system works well, including those who have changed from dual organizations.

He also cited the expected efficiency to be found in reduced staff duplications, and the need for only one central administration and budgeting system.

Athletic Director Dalt White concurred with Daniel on these issues. Both members also indicated that preliminary meetings with their staff members had produced no serious objections to the proposed new organization.

Women's Athletic Director Anne Hewett was less specific in objecting to the integration now on the grounds that it would cause conflicts of loyalty when staff members were responsible for both academic and recreational programs.

Ivey later added another argument suggesting that the size of the university was also an inhibiting factor. Student observer Chris Robinson refuted this by reference to administration theory which showed that full integration should result in greater efficiency without sacrificing any of the benefits of the current organization.

On Saturday, January 5, the Women's Athletic Association sponsored an archery tournament with many of the top amateurs and professionals in the province attending. Professional Klaus Kleinschmitt led the field scoring 320 out of a possible 350. Excellent showings were also posted by varsity archers.

The basketball Blues played only one game over the holidays. They defeated a Senior A team from the YMHA 77-69 in overtime. At half-time they trailed 35-32. The next Blues game is this Saturday when Toronto visits Laurentian.

Arthur Daley, the New York Times Pulitzer Prize-winning sports columnist, collapsed on a New York sidewalk and died last week at the age of 69.

Ice Blues finally lose to St. Mary's

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

The Varsity Blues played several games over the holidays with mixed results.

At the Sir George Williams Invitational Hockey Tournament, the Blues lost 4-3 in overtime to the powerful St. Mary's Huskies.

St. Mary's, whose hobby seems to be losing to the Blues in the Canadian championships every year, got a measure of revenge when Bim McFall scored at 5:02 of the first overtime period.

St. Mary's trailed 2-0 at the end of the first and 3-2 at the end of the second. Then four of their players who had to write exams in Halifax arrived from the airport and that turned the tide.

Bill Fifield scored two goals and Don Pagnutti added another for the Blues.

In the consolation round Varsity blasted Sir George 8-0. Larry Hopkins scored three, Pagnutti got two, while Don Harris, Doug Herridge and Rod Minns each added singles.

In a league game played Dec. 7, Blues bombed Windsor 12-1.

In other vacation exhibition action, Blues lost to Layola 3-2 and then defeated Bishops 4-2.

At a hockey tournament in New Hampshire, Blues lost to New Hampshire 10-4 but then beat them 5-2.

In the first half of the season, Blues played 22 games but only four were at home. However, of the 12 games left on the schedule, Blues play eight at home. Their first game is this Friday at 8 against Carleton.

Lone Varsity Blue battles determinedly for the puck against four Windsor Lancers. Varsity won 12-1.

Varsity swimmers swamp Waterloo

By DAN WARNER

Varsity began its dual meet season in fine style Saturday by swamping Waterloo 91-23 in the latter's home pool. The Blues, most of whom spent the Christmas vacation training in Florida, were led by Jim Adams, Mike Guinness and second year man John Sebben, each of whom won two events.

Adams took the 100 free style and the 200 individual medley. Guinness captured the 500 and 1000 free while Sebben won the 200 free and the 200 breast.

Other fine efforts were made by Zvi Eldar in the 200 fly, Dave Wilkin in the 50 and 100 free and Greg Vanutar in the 200 back.

With victories in both relays plus Jim Temple's win in the three metre diving, Varsity swept every event but the one metre diving.

This season the blues are seeking their fourteenth straight OUAA title and their eighth CIAU crown in nine years. The OUAA title is already all but captured, and in spite of the loss of many key swimmers over the past two years, coach Robin Campbell is still hopeful of yet another CIAU title.

This year the Varsity swim team is the largest ever with 24 members, including three divers and 10 freshmen.

Once again the Blues should dominate all the free-style events, led by Guinness, Adams, Wilkin, Shawn, Laari, Dave Chutter, Dave Schappert, and Jay Steele.

Laari and Chutter were not in top form on Saturday but should be ready long before the CIAU meet.

Steele, who missed Saturday's meet, showed great promise in the fall term.

John Sebben and Nick Rottman lead the Blues in the breast stroke events, complemented by first year man Lance Aho.

Greg Vanular, another rookie, has shown great promise and with another freshman, Rob Goldberg, they add depth to the backstroke contingent which also includes veterans Russ Farquhar and Neil Jones.

In the butterfly events, Zvi Eldar is off to his best start ever. He is joined by John Ruderman and another promising freshman, Bill Chisholm.

Other rookies on the team are Scott Day, Nick Hibberd, Dave McKinstry and Randy Bissett.

For the first time in many years, the Blues will assemble a strong diving team. Rookie Jim Temple brings experience from the Canadian National Championships. He joins veterans Alex Lau and Tim Bean to make the diving team a strong contender for the title.

interfac report

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

The ever inquisitive Varsity sports department learned that the usually placid Intramural Sports Office is hushing up a scandal that could make Watgate look like a small town church supper.

Yes, admitted a trembling, ashen-faced Miss Boyd under strenuous questioning, it was true that during a pre-Christmas Intermediate hockey game an Engineering team played with a certified female, Sharon Rice, in their line-up.

The Engineering team, known only as the Rabble, tied Mads G 3-3 with Rice getting a lot of ice time despite the doctors' loud protests to the referees.

"I just don't know why the referees let her go on playing," lamented Miss Boyd.

"But," she said, brightening up a little, "at least she didn't score."

The Intramural Office took away the Rabble's well-made point and sent a letter to Rice over the holidays telling her not to play again.

"Look," said the director of intramural sports, Dave Copp, "if someone like Dave Neeld can lose an eye while playing with men, it could just as easily happen to a girl and if it did, we'd feel awfully bad about it. That's why we're doing this."

Alright, perhaps it had to be done but we still think it'll set back relations between Skulemen and females at least 70 years.

Vic moving on development of excess land

By BOB BETTSON

A world-wide development consultant is planning to bring down a report on land development possibilities on the northeast campus of Victoria College.

But nobody seems to know exactly what they are considering for the area bounded by Sultan, Thomas and Charles Streets, including Victoria's president, Goldwin French.

French said in an interview yesterday the development consultants, Project Planning Associates Ltd. of Toronto, were hired to "set out all the alternatives for development of the area and assess their relative merits."

The report will be available in two to three months although French did not know exactly when. He said he did not know what the details are of the leases with the present tenants.

VUSAC President Brian Gazley said students met with Project Planning Associates was Wednesday night but the meeting inconclusive.

He said planners could not agree with the students on who to consult to determine the feelings of concerned groups and individuals on the developments.

Gazley said he was "sceptical" of the plans because of the Manulife development which fell through last year.

"We've been screwed once," he said.

"The planners insist they have no plans in mind," but Gazley admitted he felt "ambivalent" toward the whole process.

The committee who picked Project Planning Associates was composed solely of administrators, faculty and board of regents representative, with no students.

Gazley said VUSAC might have different feelings about the project if students had been on the selection committee.

Student governor Gordon Barnes, past VUSAC president, said last night he found it "upsetting" several houses owned by Vic in the area, are operated by middlemen.

"I suspect the community will not accept development plans that project planning consultants are talking about," he added.

"Manulife taught us all a lesson," Barnes said. He added Manulife has the same lawyers as Meridian, a Toronto development corporation, noted for St. James Town.

But Gazley said the project representatives denied any connection with developers.

French said they were involved in planning the new capital city for Tanzania as well as doing work for the United Nations in the U.S.S.R.

Several other factors are no doubt involved in the interest in developing the area.

There is a possibility Vic will be in a position to cash in on a multi-million dollar commercial and housing development planned for the land just north of the land Victoria owns.

Private development finds are pouring in for a massive development that will change the face of Bloor Street. At $260 a square foot the land is some of the most expensive real estate in the city.

Recent studies have revealed the Yonge and Bloor intersection is the most heavily travelled in all of Canada.

Commercial developments worth millions of dollars are flooding into the area with shopping malls and plans for over 100,000 new residents housed in high rise luxury apartments.

Another interesting spot Vic finds itself in is being the named beneficiary in the Lillian Massey will in the case the Faculty of Food Sciences ceases to exist.

French said Victoria was mentioned in both the trust fund and the building's disposition. He would not say what Victoria's reaction was to the university's December decision to phase out Food Sciences but did indicate Victoria would investigate the implications of U of T's possible breaking of clauses in the Massey will.

The Governing Council has tried to manoeuvre around the clauses, as it did in the case of the Naomi Bilton will dealing with 188 Yonge Street. In order not to be seen as closing down the faculty U of T president John Evans has announced the forming of a new department of nutrition and food sciences which will have a new program director.

U of T attempting to revise Innis lease

The university is trying to back track on a decision in November to provide a 10 year lease to the proposed housing co-op for Innis College.

Wednesday's meeting of business affairs committee of Governing council voted to have Innis Principal Peter Russell get together with business affairs officials in an attempt to revise the lease approved by November's meeting of planning and resources committee.

Both the committees must agree to the wording of the lease before the lease goes to Governing Council for approval or rejection.

Unidentified, shortwinded student go-grant at business affairs.

Russell, in a memo to business affairs, sharply criticized Governing Council's executive committee rejection of the 10-year lease.

The memo, also signed by Laura Bradbury—residence co-ordinator, warns if Innis and the university cannot agree on a lease "it would appear to rule out any attempt to establish" joint student-community housing at Innis.

The crux of the issue appears to be the extent of the control the Simcoe Hall administration would have over the Innis co-operative residence.

The executive committee voted last month to have business affairs along with planning and resources look into "the implications of the university's giving up control over the operation of university property for an extended period of time."

The Russell-Bradbury memo, however, says it would be "misleading to characterize the project as one controlled by outsiders."

The memo explains the residence is designed to have a third of its occupancy come from area residents and two-thirds from Innis students "which in itself is an important policy objective of the college."

"It is not clear to us," the memo states, "why Innis College cannot undertake residential commitments on its site for the next 10 years when other colleges have been permitted to erect residences which are designed to last for many decades."

Innis residents—to-be have already rejected a university proposal for a five-year lease because that proposal "suggests that the University of Toronto may wish to exercise its rights of ownership through Innis College and put the land to another use within the 10 year period."

The lease approved by planning and resources calls for a minimum 10-year occupancy of the residence by Innis in the Sussex-Huron Streets area, with a clause allowing extension of the lease for up to 25 years.

The lease proposal requires U of T to give the Innis residents a year's notice to vacate, but the university can elect to terminate the lease if the housing co-op is unable to meet financial obligations, the terms of the mortgage or does not properly protect and maintain the housing.

The project is unique at U of T and would be the first time community, students and a college jointly put together a community—student housing scheme.

Students and area residents are to form a non-profit corporation for the housing and lease 10 houses on the western portion of the Innis site at Sussex and Huron Streets.

CUS received CIA money: former president

The now-defunct Canadian Union of Students (CUS) once received money from a foundation in the US supported by the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) former CUS president Peter Warrien said Wednesday.

Warren made the remark during the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's hour-long TV special Wednesday detailing various activities of the CIA.

Warrien said CUS first received the grant, for a sum he did not specify, from a foundation he later learned was "a CIA front." He did not say when the money was received, nor if it was returned or kept by CUS.

CUS folded in 1969 after a number of universities, including U of T, pulled out of the organization. A new national organization, the National Union of Students, was joined by U of T in October.

Thomas Braden, former special assistant to the director of the CIA, revealed during the program the CIA commonly gave money to American non-profit foundations which funded groups the CIA supported.

Braden said if the foundations did not happen to support groups the CIA was supporting, the CIA would create a foundation to supply funding to CIA supported groups. He implied this was the case in the CUS funds.

Braden said the CIA policy was to fund left-wing organization which were anti-Communist.

This was done "because we thought the left had a broader appeal to mankind, and because the left had a program and the right did not. The right merely wanted to hold on to what it had," the former CIA official said.

The broadcast claimed a branch of the National Research Council in Ottawa, called NBNRC, is a front that spys for both Canada and the CIA. It painted a picture of Canada as a branch—plant spying subsidiary for the CIA and the American National Security Agency (NSA).

Canada is "merely an extension of the United States in a northward direction," according to former NSA intelligence officer Winslow Peck.

The broadcast said Canada is one of five signatories to a secret treaty setting up an international snooping scheme in which Canada, Britain, Australia and New Zealand feed information from their assigned areas to the NSA in Washington, DC.

Much of the electronic equipment located in Northern Canada along the Distant Early Warning Line (DEW Line) has nothing to do with detecting an attack by the Russians, but is used to monitor and record transmissions from northern Russia, according to John Marks, a former staff assistant to the US state department's director of intelligence and research.

The broadcast said the northern portion of the Soviet Union and parts of northern Europe were assigned to Canada for surveillance on behalf of the Americans.

With this arrangement, "virtually every country in the world" has its communications monitored, according to Peck. Other countries including Japan, South Africa, Greece, Brazil and India assist in this electronic monitoring system, but only the five signatories get any sort of feedback of intelligence from the Americans.

Most of the interviewed persons made it clear Canada receives far less information from the Americans on the feedback system than Canada puts into the system.

The relationship between Canada and the CIA is a hand-in-glove partnership, according to the broadcast, with the CIA having an employee Cleveland Cram, in the US embassy in Ottawa and RCMP Inspector Harry Brandes working out of the Canadian embassy in Washington for liaison purposes.

Despite this arrangement, the Americans still intercept all communications between Ottawa and the Canadian embassy in Washington, Peck said.

"Certainly the majority of the information that is being transmitted from the Canadian embassy here in Washington is breakable and certainly read by the (American) analysts and their consumer."

Just which branch of the US government are the "consumers" of Canadian diplomatic communication was not stated.

Canadian intelligence information has not been restricted to electronic snooping. The program indicated Canada was feeding the US with information during the six-day Arab-Israeli war of 1967.

The program also indicated Canadians stationed in Hanoi under the officially neutral International Control Commission informed American officials of the location of North Vietnamese anti-aircraft facilities surrounding Hanoi.

AIM says America on trial

ST. PAUL, MINNESOTA (UPI) — The first of 130 Indian people charged with offences arising from the American Indian Movement's (AIM) 71-day armed liberation of Wounded Knee, S.D., are on trial.

Russell Means and Dennis Banks, two of the principal leaders of the occupation, are charged with burglary, larceny, assaulting a federal officer, impeding federal officers, firearms violations, conspiracy, and car theft. Their trial is the first resulting from the takeover of the Pine Ridge reservation at Wounded Knee last March, which ended with two Indian dead and a wounded federal marshal.

Means said recently it is not the Indian people who participated in the occupation but the American government that is on trial. In liberating Wounded Knee, the Indian people were trying to counteract the breaking of treaties by the American government, he said.

"We did not break any laws, but in fact we went into Wounded Knee to uphold laws... We were trying to force the United States of America to live up to its own laws," Means said.

The AIM leaders said that by occupying Wounded Knee they were trying to force the American government to live up to its treaties. In a statement issued recently, Banks said "It was the judgement of those who participated in Wounded Knee of 1973 that injustice inflicted by the US government agents on Indian tribes should cease. And it was strongly felt that the government should finally honor the treaties."

Banks and Means said if the government is going to honor its treaty commitments, they will be found not guilty.

"We are going to attempt for the first time in history through the federal judiciary system, in front of a jury, to prove that we, the American Indian, do have treaty rights. If the United States is going to live up to its Constitution and idea of democracy, if it is going to honor its sacred trust, made with American Indian people, it will have to honor the 1868 Treaty—and find us not guilty," Means said.

If the Indian people are found guilty, AIM claimed this would prove the American government has no intention of honoring the treaties. "Once again we have to rely on the white man and wait for him to give us the rights we already have. If he goes against his constitution and convicts us, we will prove to the world that this is really a police state instead of a free country. The Wounded Knee trials are the most important of the century. They will expose how America practices its founding philosophy," an AIM statement said.

Academic Affairs uncertain on grading

By MARGARET ROBERTSON

The academic affairs subcommittee on curriculum and standards continued the discussion on the standardization of grades at last Wednesday's meeting, but is uncertain how to proceed.

A set of "meaningful" questions will be drawn up for discussion at the next meeting in an attempt to determine the type of data needed.

However, departments might be asked to explain such things as significant variations in the average marks obtained in the same half courses taught in fall and spring.

When the possibility of discussing marking practices with instructors in whose courses the sub-committee anomalies arose, Associate Dean Joan Foley of the Faculty of Arts and Science requested that all such proceedings be kept confidential, as they are within the faculty.

The chairman, professor W. B. Dunphy, pointed out that the sub-committee meetings were open, but at further insistence from Deal Foley agreed that in-camera sessions could be arranged.

No vote was taken and the matter was left undecided.

The sub-committee is using computer print-out sheets of marks from Scarborough College and from the departments of philosophy, physics and political economy at the St. George campus as a basis for comparison and study.

A major portion of the meeting was taken up with the presentation of a brief from the Faculty of Music regarding the establishment of a certificate course in theatre technology. Dean Beckwith pointed out that this program has been in existence for several years, but is without formal status.

It is the only course in Canada which trains technologists for work in the operatic field.

The sub-committee approved its recommendation to the academic affairs committee in principle, but required that additional information be presented at the next meeting before formal approval could be given. In other business before the sub-committee, Dean King of Scarborough College presented a report on enrolment now that Scarborough is using the "open-ended" rather than the year system.

He said that enrolment went up 20 per cent last year and that the drop-out rate for the fall term seemed to be down compared to other years.

Scarborough College held its first summer session in 1973.

GATE rejects discipline code as undemocratic

By MARINA STRAUSS

Joining the mounting cry of student groups opposing the university's new discipline code, the Gay Alliance Toward Equality (GATE) has termed it as "a mechanism of selective suppression of people and ideas... unpopular with the university administration."

In a letter to internal affairs chairwoman Marnie Paikin, GATE attacked the code's sections on rights and freedoms as being "not fully democratic."

The Students' Administrative Council, the Graduate Students' Union and the Association of Part-time University Students have already supported rejection of the code, along with most local student councils across campus and all eight student governors.

The code, which says it gives protection from discrimination at U of T on the basis of sex, race, or religion, "does not include the category of sexual orientation," charged GATE spokesman Ken Popert.

Furthermore, he added, people are protected from discrimination due neither to marital status nor to their national origin.

"Even if one's sexual orientation was protected in the code," Popert continued, "one can still discriminate against someone for his or her marital status."

"Some people don't qualify for a certain position or promotion because they're not married," he contended.

Popert charged: "Even the (Ontario) Human Rights Code covers more ground."

"It is precisely this kind of vagueness that is used to harass people. And gay people are even more sensitive to it," he said.

GATE's basic arguments against the code reflect those previously cited by other student groups.

"Several sentences and clauses leave the code open to abuse, by their vagueness," GATE claims in its letter to Paikin.

"Thus, it is the Governing Council who will decide when a student or faculty member is to be placed in double jeopardy."

By "double jeopardy," GATE refers to some cases in which students would be liable for disciplinary action by the university as well as prosecution in law courts.

"In the absence of legal precedent, who shall decide what is 'reasonable' use of facilities and 'justified' invasion of privacy?" GATE questions.

One of the more controversial clauses which students have attacked as vague and ill-defined is the offence "to disrupt intentionally, disturb or obstruct unduly any authorized activity on any premises of the university."

Popert compared the discipline code to the Criminal Code of Canada, which he said allows judges to interpret vaguely-worded and moralistic terms to dispense punishment according to their own private prejudices.

"This constitutes a serious instrument of oppression and discrimination against homosexuals," Popert asserted.

However, in divergence with many campus groups including SAC and the GSU, GATE opposes the need of any disciplinary code, even for academic offences.

"A university member who is defamed or whose property is stolen," GATE contends, "has recourse to the law enforcement agencies and courts of Canada".

GATE has come up with one very constructive suggestion.

"What is needed," it has stated, "is a code curbing the arbitrary and unjust acts of administrators, not one which encourages and legitimizes these acts."

But GATE still insists that even in such a code, the freedom from discrimination due to sexual orientation must be guaranteed.

Artistic trials: 47 tried, 27 convicted

By DAVID SIMMONDS

The long series of trials in the aftermath of the bitter strike at Artistic Woodwork is almost half way through, but well behind docket schedule.

Of 41 cases tried so far, 27 persons have been convicted and 14 acquitted. A total of 108 people have been charged with offences related to the strike.

According to Renee Block, member of the Artistic workers defence committee recording the trials on behalf of the union, there will be "masses of appeals".

The strike at the small North York plant began in August, and was not settled until December. The Canadian Textile and Chemical Union representing striking workers was trying to settle a first contract with the company.

The early morning pickets at the Densley Avenue plant turned into violent clashes between police and strikers and their supporters, as the strikers' cause attracted support from labour, clergy, community and university leaders.

The charges arise from the violence which occurred on the picket line. Most of those charged have been sympathizers, although several strikers have been charged.

Charges have also been laid against police. On Tuesday, five Metro policemen go on trial at the Old City Hall courtrooms.

The pattern of sentencing which has emerged during the trial angers strike supporters. According to Block, judges are handing out stiff sentences as deterrents.

One man, who is crippled and supported by Workmen's Compensation, was given a heavy fine by Judge E.A. Rice for his role in the case. Judge Rice told the man he would have received an absolute discharge in any other circumstances.

The judges are also singling out community leaders for the heaviest sentences, says Block. One teacher who supported the strike received a maximum sentence for Artistic convictions of $400, and an Anglican minister received a dressing down from the judge.

The most striking feature of the trials has been the sharp conflict between evidence given by police and defence witnesses.

Last December, Judge Charles Oppen complained "the story you get depends on what side you are on." In four cases of common assault, he found: "These defence witnesses are not all that believable. I don't disbelieve these witnesses, but I feel they saw what they wanted to see."

On January 8, Judge George Gardhouse convicted Tim Gallagher, a U of T student and Varsity reporter, of wilful damage. Gallagher, who ci-aims he is innocent, was supported by five defence witnesses.

A police constable and a company foreman contradicted defence evidence. Judge Gardhouse said "On the evidence before me, there's no doubt—no doubt whatsoever."

"I'm certainly not impressed by any of the evidence called by the defence."

According to the Criminal Code, a judge must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused is guilty.

On January 7, Judge Gordon Tinker acquitted Metro Police Constable Kenneth Taylor on a charge of common assault. Judge Tinker found "a great divergence" in evidence. He also noted Crown witnesses were "unionists."

Block feels people are being found guilty not because of a specific act, but merely by being a party to it.

A York University instructor was acquitted after police could neither prove the man had committed an alleged act of mischief, nor identify the constable who had arrested him.

Although the 14 week strike resulted in a contract settlement, the strike was prolonged over fear that some striking workers would not be reinstated.

The dispute is now before a 3 man arbitration board. The government-appointed chairman is Owen B. Shine, a lawyer.

US money in Canada rises

OTTAWA (CUP) — Direct investment by American-controlled corporations increased by $679 million in 1972, to an all-time high of $25,784 million.

The rise gives Canada 27.6 per cent of US capital invested abroad—the second highest concentration of American investment in the world, just behind the European Common Market nations taken together.

Total American investment in 1972 stood at $93,031 million and achieved a net return on investment of 13.2 per cent or $12,280 million per year.

Canada, which occupies a soft spot in American hearts, yielded a stable 8.7 per cent return or $2,240 million per year.

Adaptation of 18th century business practices to fit the modern context has resulted in the multinational corporations milking a 119.4 per cent return out of Arab nations. This represents a six per cent increase over 1971.

Oil is the main revenue-producing commodity obtained by the corporations in the Middle East.

Recent American concern has shifted to the European nations which have replaced Canada as the multinational corporations' number one investment target. 1972 investment showed a 11.6 per cent gain over 1971.

The devaluation of the American dollar presented little problem for the corporations as they simply switched their method of financing. Instead of using money originating from the American parent, investment of retained earnings of the subsidiaries is used.

As a result capital outflow from the U.S. declined $1.5 billion in 1972 while reinvested earnings rose $1.3 billion.

Corporations were actually able to use the international money market to their advantage by manipulating the higher valued foreign currencies.

The money obtained through such manipulation was ploughed back through the subsidiaries for investment purposes.

Reject the academic discipline code (II)

Until students have an equal share in the educational process of this university there should be no academic 'code' imposed on us. We find it extremely difficult to believe that students are in any way capable of negotiating with the administration or faculty from a position of numerical weakness on decision-making bodies.

The academic sections of the proposed 'Code of Behaviour' and the 'discipline structures and proceedings' which exist alongside them are too incredible to be taken seriously. The preamble to the code, for example, states: "breaches of the code of behaviour of the university which are also breaches of the law will normally be dealt with in the courts. However, if the university is involved or affected as an academic institution, these breaches of the Code of Behaviour may also be dealt with hereunder."

A note is also attached: "the code is not intended to give the university power to prosecute members before the university's courts for offences which are criminal unless the university's academic life is affected by such an offence." However, what does that often — repeated phrase "academic life" mean? It is so vague as to be meaningless.

We feel it will be extremely difficult for the administration to prosecute any student on the basis of such wording.

There is also the contradiction between the laws of the land and the laws of the 'Code of Behaviour' with or without the provincial government's special Statutory Procedures Act (1971). There appears to be a fundamental contradiction in the administration's code: the Simcoe Hall officialdom wants to have the power to step in if necessary, but also let the laws of Canada decide matters for them when it becomes opportune for them to define an act as not connected with "academic life".

Given the history of discipline at this campus, it isn't difficult to realize the real political implications of the code — to stifle dissent and keep the occasionally "restless natives" in line. As with any laws set up by any ruling class (in this case most members of the Governing Council) the drafters of the act are concerned with the preservation of a threatened status quo.

After all the Governing Council does not exist to hand over power to others, least of all students.

Vagueness and ambiguity permeate the code, and while such vagueness may be tolerated with respect to the Criminal Code of Canada, there is an insufficient body of precedent yet created for students to have any faith in the administration's "good word". History has proven the administration acts in the student's interest when it's in its own best interest (and that isn't often).

A note to the code's section on academic offences states: "Academic offences relate to the honesty and fairness of the teaching and learning relationship, especially with respect to evaluation. Thus the essence of an academic offence by a student is the seeking of credit by fraud or misrepresentation rather than on the basis of merit. The essence of an academic offence by a teacher is dishonesty or unfairness in dealing with the work or record of a student. Shortcomings in academic performance due to neglect or incompetence ought not to be dealt with by disciplinary processes but by suitable administrative action. In the case of the student they will be reflected in the student's academic standing. In the case of the teacher they are primarily failures to fulfill obligations to the university as employer and should be dealt with accordingly."

However, the administration of this university is the last place to find people concerned with "honesty and fairness of the teaching and learning relationship, especially with respect to evaluation." How can students evaluate teachers when the last sentence in the above note clearly defines the teaching staff's relation to the university — as an employee, not primarily a teacher (economic relationship). What about the teaching staff member's obligations to the student as 'learner', as well as the administration as 'employer'?

The teaching staff in fact evaluates the learning relationship by means of the marking system, but evaluation of the teaching-faculty relationship with the student is not officially recognized. This president for removal of a member of the teaching staff having tenure be made after a hearing under those rules. Care will have to be taken that, wherever possible, when removal of a member of the teaching staff having tenure is contemplated, the procedure under the Haist Rules and not this code be followed."

Another shocking clause in the proposed code is the retroactive one which allows the administration to prosecute students who have already obtained degrees but who the administration feels it can prosecute with some small degree of satisfaction.

mentation of the president. The persons appointed are first nominated jointly by the academic affairs committee and the internal affairs committee of the Governing Council. Students are well in the minority on both committees.

Also, none of the members of the tribunal, the hearing officers or the prosecutor are students, teaching staff, members or administrative staff.

The disciplinary procedures outline that "no person who is suspected to have a prejudicial bias or conflict of interest" will be eligible to act as a hearing officer or serve as a juror. But who will decide the so-called prejudicial bias or conflict of interest?

The chairmen and hearing officers of the heavily-dominated faculty and administration Governing Council will also "decide is an astounding contradiction considering that only last February the internal affairs committee felt it was essential "to retain symmetry of treatment for both students and teaching staff."

Members of the teaching staff, would, under the terms of the proposed code, sometimes be subject to the Haist Rules. The disciplinary tribunal could only recommend to the president the application of administrative sanctions which may include denial of merit pay increase, postponement of consideration for tenure or promotion. The Tribunal shall not have power to order expulsion of a student or removal of a member of the teaching staff, and has power only to recommend that these penalties be imposed. In any such case the recommendation shall be made by the Tribunal to the President for a recommendation by him to the Governing Council. "However, if a recommendation were to go before the Governing Council for student expulsion, there's little hope of the Council overturning the decision—after all there are only eight students on the Governing Council out of a total of 50 members. On the other hand a faculty member would stand a good chance of benefiting by the numbers game. And the internal affairs committee calls this symmetry."

It's important to note that students have been expelled from this university for academic penalties; no teaching staff member has been expelled under the Haist Rules.

The Code states: "The existence of the Haist Rules requires that the recommendation to the

The administration maintains "the integrity of the degrees, diplomas and certificates granted by the university" must be maintained.

It also reserves the right for the tribunal to recommend to the Governing Council the cancellation, and determine all questions of law including matters of interpretation of the code and the admissibility of evidence, and shall charge and assist the jury as to its verdict. Likewise, "where the jury (composed partially of students) has convicted the accused, the chairman of the hearing or the hearing officer, as the case may be, shall, after consultation with the members of the jury, determine and impose the appropriate sanction."

In effect the prosecutor, the chairmen and the hearing officers are all hired hands of the administration, and comprising the largest numbers of these "tribunals". Students merely serve a legitimizing function; without student support for such covert measures the contradictory discipline code cannot stand.

Students should demand rejection of the code until such a time when students have a real say in the decision-making structures of the university. To advocate any discipline code without considering the ramifications of its enactment can only spell further defeat for future student rights.

or suspension of any degree, diploma or certificate obtained by any alumnus who committed any academic offence, which if detected before granting of the degree, diploma or certificate, would, in the judgment of the tribunal, have resulted upon conviction in the application of any sanction sufficiently severe to lead to the loss of credit in any course or program of study pursued by that alumnus.

The disciplinary procedures are also heavily weighted against students. For example, the chairman and co-chairman of the tribunal are appointed by the Governing Council upon the recomoops!

In Monday's editorial we mistakenly left the impression that Head of Trinity College, "Crofton P. Orritt and four others" from Trinity College were "faculty and administrators". In fact the five are student administrators, responsible for aspects of internal Trinity College non-academic discipline.

Varg editorial

I agree with the sentiment expressed in the title of your Wednesday editorial, "Reject the Discipline Code". But I find your comments about academic discipline incomprehensible.

You say that students should have an academic bill of rights, "but only after students are given equal rights with faculty members of the university." This shows a callous disregard for the victims of the present academic discipline system.

The present academic procedures are grossly unfair to students. The lack of clearly defined procedures places students at the mercy of faculty. One student was recently assigned a zero grade by a professor who, without proof, thought her exam indicated cheating. After a long fight, she was exonerated.

Thus, even the most basic rights, such as the right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty, are violated. Students accused of academic offences, such as cheating and plagiarism, need to be protected.

You are quite right in saying that there are really two discipline codes within the Code of Behaviour. The non-academic part attempts to extend the university's power over students by defining new offences — conspiracy, undue obstruction, or failure to obey lawful orders. These acts are not presently being prosecuted by the university, and this part of the Code should be vigorously opposed. In the academic area, students are presently being charged and punished. We must have a set of procedures which guarantee students the fundamental rights they now lack.

SAC is committed to achieving equal rights for students with faculty. We are pressing for the right of students to negotiate operational agreement with faculty on procedures to be followed in the classroom. We are pressing for equal faculty-student representation on all decision-making bodies.

Neither of these goals will be achieved overnight. In the interim, it is our responsibility to achieve a guarantee of the rights of students involved in academic offences.

Students seeking a more just solution than the arbitrary measures contained in the university's proposals can sign the petition against the discipline code contained in the SAC mailing and now being circulated across campus.

Bob Anderson
SAC president

Ed. The "callous disregard for the victims of the present academic discipline system" Anderson speaks of are the same victims of student politics who attempt to negotiate from a position of weakness. (In fact, how can you negotiate from a position of weakness?) To suggest that a discipline code can be drawn up to protect the academic rights of students without a strong and equal student voice in the formation of the code is to lead students astray. For Anderson to say that students can "negotiate operational agreement with faculty on procedures to be followed in the class room is to demonstrate naivete. When have students achieved anything substantive at this university through negotiation?

Student council's performance so far this year leads us to believe that they think political action comes in the form of changing the world by issuing memoranda."

Liquor licensing "discriminatory"

Approval of liquor licences for the University of Toronto campus as a "canteen" complex will detract from the full participation in the university community of students in the temporary absence program. They will no longer enjoy full student status. They will be placed under intolerable pressure from their peers to enter into cafeterias or other aspects of the canteen complex. If they do so, their temporary absence privilege and college attendance must necessarily be revoked.

Here is what the Ministry of Correctional Services handbook has to say on TAP student privileges:

"Temporary absence programs as conditional steps toward full rehabilitation within the community."

"Academic and vocational studies. The opportunity for academic and vocational training is of inestimable value to the student offender. With the goodwill, interest and concern of school principals, community college presidents and university administrators it is possible for continuing studies to be undertaken by successful TAP applicants. Attendance at secondary school, community college or university has been successfully continued by many young people while still serving sentence.

"The program offsets the ill-effects and the harm of isolation, it encourages response to trust and can promote or reawaken a sense of family and community responsibility.

"It is the firm conviction of those associated with the program that if a man can handle the responsibility and trust placed in him by his spending part of each day, or several days, in the community, then he will be a better candidate for parole or post institutional probation and will be better equipped to assume the full responsibilities which his eventual total freedom will entail.

"The program has proved to be a highly successful rehabilitation tool. It helps to involve the sentenced individual in community activities and facilitates the transition from life in an institution to full participation in normal community activities.

"An inmate granted temporary absence will have the privilege revoked if:

- his conduct adversely reflects upon himself or upon the program.
- he does not abide by the terms and conditions governing his absence."

It is axiomatic that persons admitted to the university community enjoy full status as members of that community. The university should not set up facilities from which any class of student is barred. (This would not prevent colleges, houses, associations or clubs from seeking licences, as at present.) The position of North American Indian students in respect to enjoying the facilities of the lounges and dining lounges is also ambiguous and needs to be clarified. Bill 146 defines a "canteen" as a place "to which the public is not ordinarily admitted...in or on a campus, institution or facility of a university, college, community college or other publicly financed post-secondary educational facility for the use of that facility the faculty, staff and (not or) students thereof and their guests." This means that:

1) Section 96(3) of the federal Indian Act applies to the lounges and dining lounges for Indian students, making them "private places of sale and possession." BYOB will apply to Indian students, but not to others.

2) Laterality must apply. It will be "ultra vires" of the Governing Council to bar students from drinking in the faculty club.

COU repeats plea for funding reassessment

GUELPH (CUP) — In a brief presented to the Committee on University Affairs last month the Council on Ontario Universities (COU) stated that the government must review its university funding policy.

COU claims that flexibility in individual financing is needed for the universities are saddled with "an operating grants formula which does not have adaptive mechanisms for ensuring income to meet ongoing costs and for cushioning shocks of enrolment shortfalls."

W.C. Winegard, Chairman of the Council of Ontario Universities and President of the University of Guelph said that Ontario universities cannot keep operating at their present level of educational quality unless provincial funding keeps up with the rate of inflation.

Referring to the basic income unit (BIU), Winegard said that the increase over the previous year "had better be a heck of a lot more" than the five per cent the government had proposed. The BIU is an amount of money which each university receives per student. The yearly increase in the BIU has not been keeping up with the rate of inflation.

Winegard said that he did not think the provincial government was trying to de-emphasize education as many of its critics charged.

"I think they (the government) were saying the educational budget, primary and post-secondary, has been rising at a very rapid rate. They were guessing that the number of students was not going to increase substantially and they felt that this was a good time to bring the whole thing 'under control'.

"I don't believe their policy has anything to do with industry absorbing graduates or the rate of return on post-secondary educational investment..."

In the past 20 years both federal and provincial governments have treated the Ontario universities well and "it was true that four or five years ago we were getting a little on the fat side and we thought that money fell from heaven."

However, the current government action of imposing false inflation rates not only takes "away the fat but is eating away at the muscle as well."

At U of T, the false inflation rate is cutting into the university's ability to give the usual raises to staff salaries over the next few years, while government freezing of capital expenditures is slowing down the university's proposed expansion and renovation plans for some of the older buildings on campus.

Teachers: Raises only if you have a B.A.

By TOM GRAND

Some Toronto elementary teachers are getting a $100 to $300 per year pay raise, but only those with a degree and at least 10 years of teaching experience.

The rest receive no raise.

The Toronto Board of Education and the Metro Teachers' Federation revised the Metro Toronto elementary teacher's salary agreement for 1973-74 December 10.

The salary scale is based on two factors: categories — educational qualifications and steps — numbers of years teaching experience.

Category one corresponds to grade 13 and teachers college, category two to one year of university and teacher's college, category three to two years of university and teachers college and so on.

The lowest categories one and two, are unaffected by the latest revisions.

Categories three to seven with ten years experience or more will now receive a $100 increase over the increases negotiated in the original June 1973 agreement.

Furthermore the salary maximums for categories four and five were increased by $100, category six by $200 and category seven by $300. The salary maximums for categories one to three — those teachers who lack a B.A. — are unchanged under the revised agreement.

On the surface it appears that the revised salary agreement means that those with the least get nothing and those with more get a raise.

However, Mattice pointed out that this is not completely true since all elementary Metro Toronto teachers had won increases in the original salary agreement.

He explained the revisions are because salary agreements are negotiated separately by the Elementary Teachers Federation and the Secondary Teachers Federation.

The recent adjustments in the elementary teachers salary agreement were made to achieve parity with the secondary school teachers salary agreement reached November 20.

The revised salary scale according to Mattice, follows the basic philosophy of the Ontario Teachers Federation to award those with higher qualifications, such as higher education.

This it is hoped will induce teachers to improve their qualifications and also bring teachers salaries more in line with comparable fields of employment, he said.

Furthermore greater increases for teachers in the higher categories are necessary to offset the effects of higher taxation in those areas.

On the whole, salary negotiations in the past year benefit teachers in general, although they benefit some more than others, he said.

Organization root of problems: BC commisioner

By TOM GRAND

The intelligence of a community is rooted in the patterns of social organization.

For John Bremer, commissioner of education in British Columbia, problems in education are a reflection of more general problems such as poverty, hunger and unemployment.

Only by developing better patterns of organization can the community hope to solve its problems, he said Wednesday.

"Intellectually everyone knows the situation" Bremer said, "but because there is no social structure to bring the groups involved together with community problems.

Bremer is perhaps best known as the former architect and director of the Parkway Program School without walls.

Philadelphia's Parkway Program was the outgrowth of the main theme of Bremer's presentation that intelligence in the community has to do with the pattern of social organization.

The Parkway Program was a experiment which used scientific, civic, cultural and business institutions of the city for its school.

Students got the benefit of these rich community resources at virtually no expense to the tax-payer.

Bremer's message is an example of Exorcist chills a lapsed Catholic's spine

It is tempting to join the smart condemnation of the The Exorcist and write it off as a vulgar and reprehensible shock treatment. But it looks as if this movie is making so much money so fast that in a week or so it will be in the pantheon — Gone with the Wind, The Sound of Music, The Godfather. A shocker is how it styles itself, all right, and everything it promises, it delivers, in spades.

In fashionable Georgetown, a 12-year-old girl shows signs of severe psychic derangement. It turns out she is possessed by the devil, and an elderly priest who once performed a month-long exorcism in Africa is called in — although without much hope that he can succeed where brain surgeons and hypnotists have failed. Director William Friedkin paves the way for the exorcism in an unsettlingly slow and vague build-up. The soundtrack is loud with scrapes, whines and jangles, and in one ominous shot, over an irragal sunset like an enormous blood orange, the vicious snarling of rabid dogs crescendoes to nerve-wracking force.

Unlike Rosemary's Baby, which by comparison is an almost coy exercise on the theme of lapsed-catholic paranoia, little time is wasted here on the ambiguities and uncertainties of the situation. Friedkin lunges straight for the horrors, which he delivers with all the literalness he can muster. The devil's earthly host twists her head around a full 360 degrees, bellows obscenities in a bass voice that seems filtered through ground glass, ejects precise streams of vomit resembling pureed avocado, and rams a crucifix bloodily into her vagina.

The movie overwhelms you. Though the gruesome effects, the photography and most of the acting are done with faultless professionalism, it's a mistake to credit Friedkin with the film's power. The film is horrifying not because of its horrors, but because of the culminating struggle between Satan and two priests who try to exorcise him (one of whom, Max von Sydow, brings his uncanny dignity even to this unlikely film). The presumption operating here, as it did in Rosemary's Baby, is that Satan deigns to appear only as an anti-catholic spectre. The heady sense of sacrilege only makes sense in a Catholic setting. I'm speaking here as someone who discarded his own Catholicism ten years ago, but still I can't see how this movie would have had the same power set in a context of hymn-singing protestantism. The litany of the exorcism rite ("The power of Christ compels you", "The blood of the martyrs compels you", "The blood of the martyrs compels you"), chanted in that affluent horror-chamber of a teen-aged girls bedroom, had my skin tingling. The Exorcist gives me the same feelings I have when I read about California witchcraft, sacrificed pigs, black masses, ritual murders. The people who fool around with this tacky nonsense are dim, desperate souls out for the slickest kick they can dream up. Unfortunately, and unwittingly, they often stumble into things that, for whatever reasons, have a way of getting out of hand. So with Friedkin. He set out to do a lavish, graphically executed horror movie, an Inquisition-style French Connection. And inadvertently he touched upon themes that remain awesome and disquieting for all but those who have several generations of rational atheism behind them to fall back on.

Beach Boys back surfing again

The Beach Boys In Concert
Brother/WEA; $12.58

It's hard to believe that a band that started off in the early '60s with a hit song born of a rewritten Chuck Berry tune, and barely able to play their instruments could still be around in 1974. The Beach Boys have managed to do just that by changing with the times.

The Beach Boys actually made a comeback of sorts about three years ago marked by the album Surf's Up. Leader Brian Wilson faded completely into the background (he's a recluse, and it's been reported that he'll often not utter a single word for up to two weeks), and two South African blacks, Blondie Chaplin and Ricky Fataar, were added to the group. The harmonies were stronger than ever and the group pursued a new standard of excellence in the recording studio—a standard best exemplified by the last LP, Holland.

During the last few years the group worked hard to avoid the old surfing music and be accepted for their new music. It was in fact, the Dutch enthusiasm for those new sounds that influenced the band to go to Holland and record that last LP.

The success of Holland made the group more secure in their abilities to write and produce, and consequently the reluctance to play the early hits disappeared. The new live album certainly attests to that change of attitude.

The Beach Boys In Concert was recorded live during the winter tour of 1972 and the summer tour of 1973 and represents only their second live LP in over a decade of recording (the last one came out around 1964). The songs on this two album set include classic hits like "Surfer Girls", "Surfin' USA", "Help Me Rhonda" and "Fun, Fun, Fun". Much of the rest of the material was derived from the last two releases, Pet Sounds/So Tough and Holland.

The sound is of high quality, especially where the harmonies are concerned. But the instruments tend to get muddled into the background with annoying frequency. The absence of Brian Wilson is most felt on the older songs where he handled the vocals. His brother Carl has a similar voice, but it can't quite reproduce the familiar high pitched tones in "Caroline, No" or "Help Me Rhonda".

"Good Vibrations", is disappointingly anemic but an A plus for "Sail On Sailor", "Surfer Girl" and "Wouldn't It Be Nice".

Do you want to make something of it?

Manischewitz Concord Wine is for people who find the taste of dry wine about as pleasant as smokers' tooth powder. Make something of it. Like:

Manischewitz Purple Cow

Stir together equal parts of Manischewitz Concord Wine and vodka. Serve on the rocks and add a twist of lemon.

Manischewitz Hi-Boy

Fill a tall glass with ice cubes. Add 3 jiggers of Manischewitz Concord Wine, and fill with ginger ale or club soda. Top with lemon slice. Stir.

Manischewitz Party Punch

A knock-out. Dissolve ¾-cup sugar in juice of 6 lemons. Add tray of ice cubes, 1 bottle Manischewitz Concord Wine and 1 bottle of club soda. Stir gently until very cold.

For other interesting Manischewitz recipes, write Suite 800, 234 Eglinton East, Toronto.

The start of something great.

Harvey Keitel as Charlie is a minor mafia version of a White House aide in this much-better-than-the-Godfather show.

Mean Street:

a leering look at Little Italy's inferno

The most arresting and accomplished film of the year is Mean Streets. It has content, and does it have style. There's barely a false note in it, and the young director Martin Scorsese shapes the whole with the sure instincts of an artist. He may never be able to do it again, but he's put together a full-fledged work of art, steeped in the sensibilities of crime, Catholicism and New York's Little Italy. Mean Streets works with themes The Godfather just played with, and is virtually an underground version of that Mafia epic, shorn of melodrama and romance.

The gaudy byways of lower Manhattan, the turf of loitering young men with yearnings for glamour, are the title's mean streets, though "back rooms" or "after hours" are equally descriptive. Everything that happens, so to speak, happens behind facades. In bars or restaurants after closing time, in the "employees only" areas, men gather to attend to their "business" which is so closely woven into their studied leisure and peacock posturing as to be inextricable. The boundaries between the frivolous and the lethal are treacherous.

Charlie is an affable small-time hoodlum on the way up, without a vicious bone in him. His uncle is a somebody in local criminal circles, and to this third-string don, Charlie is as obsequious as those craven, clean-cut errand boys in the White House were to Bob Haldeman. (In organized crime, as in business and politics, asses are reverently kissed). Charlie, too is a glorified errand boy, patrolling the streets in his conspicuously chic clothes, looking in, checking up, reporting back. He takes his work very, very seriously, unlike his friend Johnny Boy.

The trouble with Johnny Boy, a punk kid on the most threadbare fringes of the mob, is that he likes the pizzazz of being a mafioso but can't get a grasp on the responsibilities that go with it. He sinks deeper and deeper into trouble, piling up debts and gambling away the money to settle them. The more desperate his plight becomes (Charlie calls it "a situation"), the more reckless Johnny Boy becomes, hoping that if he plays the clown the situation will turn into a joke. The grim elders look on him as hopeless and pressure Charlie into washing his hands of his embarrassing friend.

But Charlie is torn between the "prestige" of his position and his instincts. He's fond of Johnny Boy, much as he's fond of the girl, Theresa, he sleeps with, but in both cases he's afraid to defy his uncle (who tells him Theresa is "sick in the head" — she's an epileptic). Charlie's undoing is that he wants everybody to like him and so he ends up with their contempt. The three walls of Charlie's neurosis — duty, instinct, sin — close in on him, and he's caught. He set out to become a "man of respect" and, not yet out of his twenties, he's already a crone, a macho model of those ageless harpies in black who preside over restaurant bathrooms in Italy.

Flames hold a painful fascination for Charlie, suggesting to him the hellfire he dreads. The film looks like it was filmed on location in Dante's fifth circle, instead of the Little Italy full of the wrathful who fear that they will one day be consigned there. An intense chiaroscuro reinforces this theme, and the film has a leering, obsessed look, with tormented faces sweating off a lurid glow against backdrops black as acetylene smoke.

As Deliverance was a man's picture in the most pompous, myth-ridden way, Mean Streets is a man's picture at its most unsparring and poignant. Scorsese isn't conned by the masculine mystique or the more exaggerated mafioso mystique. His is a shrewd, almost basilisk eye for men in groups, their sombre Mediterranean rituals, the chips balanced on their shoulders as fastidiously as the monograms sewn on their shirts. Scorsese is more trenchant even than Francis Coppola of The Godfather about how men come to ruin in brutal playgrounds of their own devising. In fact, a thesis is bruited through the film that men enjoy making unholy messes of their lives, much as they enjoy losing a month's pay at poker or snapping cartilage in pointless donnybrooks.

The men are splendid. Harvey Keitel gives a subtle, compressed performance as Charlie, bringing all those conflicts and confusions to the top. How much he was acting and how much was already in his old-young, open-sultry face I don't know, but the result is admirable. Robert de Niro's work as Johnny Boy is rare cadenza. He skitters through the movie like a water globule in a hot skillet. Watching him next to Keitel is like comparing fireworks to Rembrandt. The role is one of a gutsy misfit, and like Elliott Gould in The Long Goodbye, he takes it further than it's ever gone, out into the surreal. But everyone in this movie looks the part, and seems to feel the part, too. The players fit the milieu like a shadow fits a corner.

This is a rich film and while not in the least arty, it is sometimes difficult. Fragmentary subplots, or rather peripheral plots, drift in and out again leaving the viewers to fill in beginnings, motives, ends. Violence flares and subsides according to its own headstrong rhythm, and the wonderfully coarse argot of these chummy mafiosi laces brightly through the film. Mean Streets is many-faceted, but it may take a second viewing to tune into the exhilarating, manic eddy of farce that trills across the surface of the action as unmistakably as the organ dirge that rumbles underneath.

There is too much to say about the movie, too much suggested in the text that could be made clumpily explicit. Mean Streets is an exciting, well-textured movie, as satisfying as Last Tango in Paris ought to have been. Of current rivals, only The Long Goodbye comes close in artistic daring and sureness of execution, and Troell's The New Land has the same undeniable quality, though it's light years away in its tempo and sensibilities. But all three moves, the year's finest, mine the inexhaustible lodes of the American dream and its doomed, passionate pursuers.

conrad o'connor

The pallor of positive thinking

Dr. Norman Vincent Peale — apostle of positive thinking, spiritual counselor of his nation's Chief Executive, Aquinas of the Reader's Digest — began the long journey to success and God in his early teens.

He decided to go into business selling aluminum pots and pans door-to-door to the frugal housewives of Bellefontaine, Ohio, but his first attempts were dismal failures. His carefully-prepared sales pitch was forgotten, and he could only bring himself to stammer, "You don't — want any pots and pans — do you?" He enlisted the help of a friend, who, on his first attempt, made a sale. Norman was astounded.

"How did you do it?"

"I just told her she needed 'em", his friend replied. Matter of fact, she does. If you believe in what you're selling, you can sell anything."

"Gosh! The brochure didn't say that." "Never mind the brochure", his friend said. "Just have faith in the product! And somewhere along the line, tell 'em something nice about themselves!"

Norman had learned the cardinal rule of salesmanship. Make the customer think he can't get along without what you're selling, and you can't lose. "And somewhere along the line, tell 'em something nice about themselves."

Fifty years later he had written several best-sellers with titles like "The Power of Positive Thinking", "The Amazing Results of Positive Thinking", "A Guide to Confident Living", "The Art of Living", "Stay Alive All Your Life", and "Enthusiasm Makes the Difference". These books propose "formulas for effective living" which can change "sorrow to joy, weakness to strength, failure to success, despair to hope, and defeat to victory". These claims may seem slightly inflated to the skeptic; but Dr. Peale is not one to hedge his bets.

The formula is twofold. Including God and a mental attitude which has become well-known as positive thinking.

"Positive thinking", Dr. Peale says, "is a form of thought which habitually looks for the best results from the worst conditions".

This is a theme which constantly recurs in the books you can find classified under "Self-improvement" in Coles. Such an attitude has probably existed since the discovery of misfortune. Things aren't so bad, you just think they are. Or as Pangloss (whose works, unfortunately are not available at Coles) put it, "Everything is for the best in this best of all possible worlds".

A good example of positive thinking's spiritual ancestry is provided by "Self-Mastery Through Conscious Autosuggestion", a charming tract written by Dr. Emile Coué of Paris in 1920. Among other things, Dr. Coué has discovered that: — "When you wish to do something, or when you have a duty to perform, always think that it is easy, and make the words 'difficult', 'impossible', 'I cannot', 'it is stronger than I', 'I cannot prevent myself from', disappear from your vocabulary; they are not English. What is English is: 'It is easy and I can'. By considering the thing easy it becomes so for you, although it might seem difficult to others. You will do it quickly and well, and without fatigue, because you do it without effort; whereas if you had considered it as difficult or impossible it would have become so for you simply because you would have thought it so."

Naturally, this is just the ticket for mankind, oppressed by toil and pain. And a generous sampling of enthusiastic testimonials indicates that mankind has been quick to embrace Dr. Coué and the fruits of autosuggestion. Case after case of insomnia, headaches, eye troubles, intestinal disorders, heart attacks, tuberculosis are paraded dispiritedly before the reader; all are vanquished.

Yet the farsighted Dr. Coué perceives even more beneficial applications of his method. Depression and self-doubt disappear before the healing onslaught. But best of all is the miraculous simplicity of this method, so that Dr. Coué need only offer a single admonition to his befuddled patients:

"As long as you live, every morning before getting up, and every evening as soon as you are in bed, you must shut your eyes, so as to concentrate your attention, and repeat twenty times, moving your lips, (that is indispensable) and counting mechanically on a string with twenty knots in it the following phrase: 'Every day, in every way, I am getting better and better'."

Positive thinking has a lot in common with self-mastery through conscious autosuggestion. But Dr. Peale's work puts less emphasis on curing specific phys-cal or mental disorders than it does on achieving success in economic, social, or marital situations. Unlike much self-improvement literature, faith in God plays a prominent part. The combination leads to some rather unlikely theology.

"You remember", writes one of his innumerable disciples, "that we had been looking for a car since last October when our seven-year-old Studebaker started giving us fits. We found the one we wanted then, a second-hand Buick, but we felt that we didn't need such a fine one. So Jim kept looking and looking, but none came up to the Buick in price, mileage, cleanness and all things considered.

"So one day he said, 'Well, we know we don't need that nice a car; we know we don't have the down payment, but if that's the car we're supposed to have, the down payment will come to us, and the car will still be on the lot waiting when it does.'"

"Imagine our surprise when Jim got a note from the office saying they were going to pay him a bonus on his profit. And instead of the usual ten per cent, it was fifteen per cent! So there was our down payment! And after four months of waiting, the car was still there!"

This happy little story is offered as an example "of how God is looking after us". What makes this story, and others like it, remarkable, is that the normal state of religious experience is reversed. The apprehension of God is not an end, but a means.

Another of Dr. Peale's readers, who runs a clothing store, had a large number of debts owing to him. He was complaining of this situation to a friend, and received the following reply.

"All right now, will you try an experiment? Send out all of those bills as usual, but this time say a prayer for the person who will be receiving it. In your prayer express the desire that each person have a happy and prosperous use of the clothing which you have sold him. Pray that things will go well with him. Then at the bottom of the bill add a word of personal interest. Simply, 'I hope you are enjoying the sweater,' or 'If there is any problem with this pair of shoes, be sure to bring them in and we will see what we can do about it.' Then add a cheery word like 'Lots of luck,' or 'Hope the family is all well.'"

"And then", Dr. Peale comments, "was he surprised. Right away an amazing thing happened. Of the ninety-six debtors, over half promptly remitted in whole or in part."

But one cannot help wondering, would this incident have been cited if the debtors had failed to remit promptly in whole or in part? The conclusion suggested is not that the clothing store owner learned to love his fellow man, but that he learned a more efficient way of collecting his debts.

So we have returned to the principle of salesmanship Norman learned in Bellefontaine, Ohio. "While you're at it, tell 'em something nice about themselves."

It is not surprising that this idea of God or brotherhood should have emerged in North America in the twentieth century. More than any other time or place, this is the age of the salesman. This is a society which cannot continue to exist without an artificially high degree of production and consumption of goods. The salesman convinces us that we really need a 1974 model electric can opener. So, perhaps, he goes to the trouble of learning his customer's first name, of saying "Hope the family is all well", of giving a friendly handshake.

The word "surrender" appears often in Dr. Peale's theology. But it is not a surrender of desire, or will, only of responsibility for everything that is bad in the world.

"A positive thinker does not refuse to recognize the negative, he refuses to dwell on it. It is possible to look for something to build on; it is possible to expect the best for yourself even though things look bad."

But what does it mean, this refusal to dwell on the negative? Certainly there are forces over which we have little control, such as winter and death, and to dwell on these is clearly not productive. But just as certainly there are other forces over which we do, or might, have control. To dwell on the negative is to demand a reason why, to think "things might be otherwise". It is the birth of possibility.

For Dr. Peale and those who accept his teachings, a universe of possibility is an unthinkable one. Why worry yourself about hunger, war, death, lives of lovelessness and boredom? The world is given, and only God can change it. With his cosmic expense account, he picks up the tab for evil, and lets us reap the fruits, a second-hand Buick.

Dr. Peale's social and political positions, although never made explicit in his writing, show a strong affinity for those in power. When Billy Graham is off Crusading, Dr. Peale often conducts the Sunday morning services in the White House chapel. He performed the ceremony at the wedding of Julie Nixon and David Eisenhower.

"Every American," Nixon said on that happy occasion, "should have an interest in all Dr. Peale stands for — a reverence for God and country, a contagious enthusiasm, and inspiring advocacy of the positive values in life — and through all he does for his fellow man, a tough-minded optimism."

During the 1960 presidential campaign, Dr. Peale made one of his rare forays into the political arena. He was, depending on whose account you read, either chairman or a member of a group of Protestant clergymen who expressed anxiety that Kennedy's election might lead to domination of American foreign policy by the Vatican.

The group issued a statement to that effect, which received a great deal of negative reaction, in the press and elsewhere. The New York Times, then Time, then Newsweek, then The Nation began to talk about "Peale's group". Dr. Peale protested. It wasn't his group, he was just an interested observer, he didn't realize what the group was saying, and when he thought about it he really didn't agree with them at all. Within a week he had dissociated himself from the group and its statement.

The most fitting tribute he ever received was made by the Advertising Sales Club of New York in 1958, when he was distinguished by the title of "America's Most Sales-Minded Clergyman". Only in America could a small-town boy start out selling aluminum pots and pans and end up selling God. And — of course — he owes it all to the power of positive thinking.

A modest proposal

"I have no doubt that St. Paul would gladly have used television, if it had been available to him."

-Dr. Norman Vincent Peale

A television studio. An organist plays a subdued but cheery version of "Pack Up Your Troubles in Your Old Kit Bag and Smile, Brother, Smile". The stage lights go up and a round-faced man with round rimless glasses enters. The audience bursts into lusty applause.

"Hi, folks, and welcome once again to 'Speak No Evil', the great game show where lucky contestants find out that despite their lives of pain and dullness, everything's A-OK! I'm your host, Norman Vincent Peale. I think today's contestant is ready, so let's play 'Speak No Evil'!"

An obese old woman shambles out from the wings. Dr. Peale puts a friendly arm around her shoulder.

"Well, audience, this is Mrs. Marge Simpson of Flatbush, New York. She may not look it, but Mrs. Simpson is only thirty-eight years old! Now, Mrs. Simpson, you know how our game is played. Would you like to curse your fate for our studio audience and the viewers at home?"

Mrs. Simpson slowly approaches the microphones. She coughs heavily, finally catches her breath, and begins to speak in a low monotonous voice.

"The last job I had was in the fifties, making bullets for Korea. My two sons were killed there. My husband couldn't make it for their funeral, said he's found a nice little cocktail waitress in Reno and doesn't want to come back. I haven't seen him since. We had a little house, but he took the mortgage payments when he left, so I got evicted. Now look at me. I'm ugly, I'm fat, I have no friends and no money. The welfare payments haven't come through for the last month. The gas company cut off the heat, and the landlord says he's going to evict me next week. What am I supposed to do? I have arthritis so I can't work. I have no money, nowhere to go, nobody cares. God damn, I wish I'd never been born!"

Appreciative applause.

"You know, Mrs. Simpson, I'll bet this crisp dollar bill your trouble isn't as bad as you think. It's pretty easy to point at our government's defense of democracy in Asia, or the gas company, or the landlord but so often on our show, we find that the real culprit is a negative frame of mind. And you've probably neglected to call upon that great Partner who makes evil disappear faster than Comet removes stubborn stains. I'll offer you this challenge: try God, just for a month, and tell yourself every day that everything's just apple-pie OK. After all", a wry smile, "what have you got to lose?"

More applause. Mrs. Simpson shambles off stage.

"And now, audience, for our next contestant. He's Mr. Eddie P. Rec Thebes. He's had a little falling-out with his parents and some eye trouble. We'll help him find abundant success right after this word."

Ms. America explores sex roles and game-playing

Factory Lab Theatre premiered Leon Rooke's latest play last weekend to celebrate the new year. If the work, a satiric swipe at sexual stereotypes entitled Ms. America, indicates the Lab offering for the coming season, the next 12 months could be a delight for Toronto audiences.

Staged in the Bathurst United Church, the production offers a quick-paced, witty examination of contemporary attitudes on interactions of men and women. Rooke, a much travelled and talented B.C. playwright, provides an excellent script as base. Combined with a polished performance from the two member cast, the production moves through the vicissitudes of a game playing middle-aged couple, enlightening and delighting on route.

The plot focuses on a man (The Interviewer-David Brown) assigned to interview the reigning queen as liberated woman, Ms. America (Nuala Fitzgerald). As we meet them, (The Interviewer tapping the phone and calling a mysterious friend named Flom while the Queen, following Emily Post etiquette to the T, serves the same), they appear as relative strangers.

Conversation ensues, unraveling each character's respective idiosyncrasies. In the course of the dialogue, the audience begins to realize that the characters have been through the interview before. The answers are by rote: the reaction almost expected in every circumstance. The characters are acting, replaying an old script that they appear to have followed for years. Bob, the interviewer, resembles all the Queen's lovers. At some time in the past, he has acted the role of each of his wife's lovers. The farce becomes a drama of psychological deception and role playing in interpersonal relationships.

Interspersed in the dialogue are several clandestine telephone calls, by Bob, to the mysterious Flom. Finally, Flom, Bob's bawdy pornographic alter ego, arrives. A hilarious parody of pornography follows—ribald but funny.

After intermission, the couple continue to charade although the tone shifts. The characters play a perpetual game. Both survive only behind the masks of Queen and Interviewer. The disguises are volatile—slipping, shifting—but never disappear. Each character strains to keep the act alive.

The humor persists but pathos, upon recognition of the futile game that both failing characters cower under, subtly dominates the closing moments. When Bob announces that the "Queen is dead," perhaps the sham will end. But she reappears, having donned a new mask, to ensure that the farce will continue.

Rooke's script resembles several recent artistic endeavors that deal with the psychological necessity of game and role playing. One of Pinter's plays contains a man and a woman, who live the mundane life of antiseptic kisses and canned conversation by night while playing a pair of torrid lovers during the working hours. Rooke's interview game is played with the same underlying intensity as Martha's Rouse of "bringing up baby" in Albee's Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf. Rooke's wit, at times too verbose, accentuates the game mentality.

A tandem cast seldom works, usually the same faces and voices overtax the viewer. Nuala Fitzgerald and David Brown are an exception to this rule, however, and succeed admirably in the task.

Fitzgerald plays all the roles that the Queen plays with the vitality of a frustrated middle-aged woman that lurks behind the multiple masks. Her talents enliven the charade. She handles the gamut of female roles: the immaculately conceived slut, the liberated Queen, and the seductress, with solid finesse.

Brown, as the Interviewer, likewise presents a multi-faceted character. When his hat is not taken, he whimpers like Charlie Brown; sexually reprimanded he dons male ego to reassert himself. He makes the transition of masks essential to the character and play credible. His slapstick routine as the pop porno prince Flom earns a well deserved applause.

If any problem confronts the play, it may be the scope of the undertaking. Rooke presents a plethora of interpersonal problems: (role playing, sexual frustration), and larger problems (the Beauty Queen fiasco, the liberation of the liberated woman). He satirizes our stereotypes; ridicules the rubric of relationships. But a resolution never appears. Why are these characters doing this? What reasons explains the events? The characters recognize the charade but never attempt to surmount it. Without an answer or end, the meaning of the charade blurs. The viewer is left confused and uncertain—perhaps as Rooke intended—about the purpose and final effect of the play.

Brain over brawn in Khatchaturian

Khatchaturian: Piano Concerto
Franck: Symphonic Variations
Alicia de Larrocha, Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos,
London Philharmonic
London

Alicia de Larrocha is one of the few women active in the international concert scene today, but active she is. This is the latest addition to a long series of impressive albums on the London label, and she takes on Philippe Entremont in work which he has chosen to make his specialty in the past few years. Entremont played this concerto with the Toronto Symphony during last year's season, and Columbia released a recording of it with Seiji Ozawa doing the stick-waving. Maybe some of Ozawa's taste for the spectacular rubbed off on Entremont, because his performance was marred by some all-out heavy pounding on the keyboard. At the time, it all seemed very exhilarating, but when I awoke the next morning, Doctor, it had all seemed so cheap...

There's excitement to spare in this new recording, but de Larrocha manages to convey it without giving the appearance of trying to break all the bottom octave strings. In particular, the long cadenza in the first movement is clear and admirably free of over-peddaling. Rafael de Burgos was also a performer in last season's roster of TSO performances, and his work here is as dynamic as on Massey Hall's podium. He too has a taste for the spectacular, but moderates it a bit in the interests of a balanced reading. Incidentally, I'm not opposed to spectaculars. Seiji's performance of the Berlioz's Romeo and Juliet was (for me, anyway) the most impressive evening the Toronto Symphony came up with last year, and I'd give my toenails to hear him do some Mahler.

Entremont's disc used the Liszt Hungarian Fantasia as a filler (the work only runs a little over one side), but de Larrocha has chosen the Franck Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra. This is hardly under-represented in the catalogues, but it too is given a fine reading. London's engineers have given (as usual) careful attention to balancing the soloist and the orchestra, but with plenty of emphasis on the bass range, (do they tie a mike to the left hand side of the sounding board?)

All told, de Larrocha wins the bout with Entremont by a judicious use of brain over brawn. Next week, the masked Violinist meets Hans Zauberpauken, the Bavarian terror for five rounds of musical mayhem. Be there!

British folk-rock: how much wah-wah does a madrigal need?

Rosie Fairport Convention/A & M

Sandy Denny's split from Fairport Convention is like Janis Joplin's from Big Brother and the Holding Company. Both bands and both singers went on doing well, but never with the total magic of Cheap Thrills or, in Fairport's case, Liege and Lief.

Splits are the rule for Fairport Convention which is like the post office in its turn-over of personnel. None of the current members were around at the beginning, nor were any on the band's second roster, and only one was there for the third Convention. The current quartet is number six. But the style has remained the same, rough, rhythmic, merry and somehow traditional, even though almost all the tunes are now originals. Like any group with seven years and seven albums behind them, Fairport's output goes up and down. Last year's two albums, Angel's Delight and Babbacombe Lee were downers for me, though they received plenty of acclaim elsewhere. But Rosie, their new release on A and M, is, I think, much better. I has a nice feel that becomes more apparent the more I hear it. I like Dave Pegg's bass voice leads—you don't often hear basses singing lead in rock—and of course Dave Swarbrick's fiddle, and his tune "Rosie", one of those slow rockers like "You Ain't Going Nowhere" or "Who Knows Where the Time Goes?" Now and then songs seem rhythmically paced to some slow, steady internal organ.

Even when they are not inspired, which they haven't really been since Liege and Lief, there's a sense of fun that keeps me comfortable with Fairport Convention.

Sandy
Sandy Denny/A & M

Sandy Denny has been doing well enough on her own and Sandy, her latest North American release, finds itself on my turntable pretty regularly. Denny's sound is clearer and more serious than her funky Fairport days. There's something about the top English folk vocalists (Denny, Maddy Prior of Steeleye Span and Jacqui McShee of Pentangle) that makes each woman distinctive without her doing anything unusual. They manage power without gymnastics. Denny's singing has gotten so good that it covers for her writing which, while not bad on Sandy, reveals no new "Who Knows where the Time Goes."

Sandy washes nicely: it is cleanly produced and the back-up musicians, including Swarbrick and Richard Thompson, once of Fairport, work tastefully. But, like Joplin's bands subsequent to Big Brother, the musicianship may be improved, but they don't breathe like the old gang.

As time passes Liege and Lief by Fairport 3, including Denny and Swarbrick, seems like Sergeant Pepper, more an event than just a record.

Parcel of rogues
Steeleye Span/Chrysalis (WEA)

Meanwhile, Steeleye Span becomes increasingly played over here for its blend of British traditional songs and harmonies with heavy, heavy fuzz-tone electric guitar and bass. Steeleye are much more reverent about their folk music than Fairport, but then they overlay it with a stripped down, but even more abrasive and insistent rock. Imagine Pentangle raved by The Who.

The high water mark for Steeleye was their 1971 collector's piece, Ten Man Mop, which may or may not be available here. For that record Martin Carthy, about the most respected and certainly the most alive traditional singer in England, joined Maddy Prior. Steeleye has never equalled the result, though Parcel of Rogues, their latest, comes closer than the earlier albums. The ingredients, except for Carthy, stay the same for Steeleye, and that is their chief drawback: a few too many fuzz-tone whip-cracks, a few too many oddly divided counter-rhythms per record. "Cam Ye Oer Frae France", on Parcel of Rogues works brilliantly as Maddy Prior's pure two octave Scots gets relentlessly bashed by the electric guitar. It's eerie and frightening even on repeated listenings, a terrific cut. But the same effect is repeated on others and it starts to pall.

O Lucky Man
Alan Price/WEA

Alan Price's score to O Lucky Man!, while one of the best ever written for a movie, doesn't separate from the film as well as it might have. In the theatre these spare songs offered a nice restraint on film-maker Lindsay Anderson's more baroque flights of cynical fancy. But without the images they counterpoint, Price's tunes seem exceptionally cynical themselves. Making O Lucky Man (the movie) was such an act of commitment that it softened the blows in the world Anderson conjured up. No such faith automatically accrues to putting out the record, so, one fears, it could be heard as just another nihilistic outpouring from the industry that brought you Alice Cooper, Black Sabbath and the Stones.

The ambience of Price's light, up-beat vehicle for sentiments such as "Look over your shoulder, 'cause there's always someone coming after you" remains on the record, but the heavy words tend to swamp the light tunes. (In rock it's almost always the other way around). Not that the lyrics aren't good: they are exceptionally intelligent and deftly put as in "We'd harmonize so clear even though it was the beer that made the tears run about the years gone by". Price's husky, wise voice and the tight little arrangements serve the words well. But, perhaps because it may be the shortest record ever released as an album, it remains unsubstantial. On the other hand, it is without a doubt the best movie souvenir ever made. And by no means the most expensive.

Children's books escape from stereotypes

Mandy and the Flying Map
by Bev Allison and Ann Powell, $3.25

Fresh Fish...and Chips
by Jan Andrew and Linda Donnelly, $3.25

both Published by Canadian Women's Educational Press

The Canadian Women's Educational Press has published its first two children's books, Mandy and the Flying Map and Fresh Fish...and Chips. These books try to counter the present stereotyping of boys and girls into rigid sex roles and pose alternatives to the competitive, authoritarian values present in much of children's literature.

Fresh Fish...and Chips is written by Ottawa author Jan Andrew in delightful verse, and vibrantly illustrated by Edmontonian Linda Donnelly.

It's a book for children which presents alternatives to traditional parental roles. While mother goes to catch fish, father stays at home to peel potatoes for chips. Mother brings in a fantastic catch: "first she caught an octopus, and then she caught a snail, and then she caught a hermit crab...and then she caught a whale". The exotic creatures emerge from the sea and humorously resist the frying, boiling, pickling and stewing. The whale stays on as a pool pal and the family decides that ordinary fish is not so bad.

Mandy and the Flying Map is written by Bev Allison, a children's author living in Toronto, and illustrated in three colours by artist Ann Powell, teacher at the Ontario College of Art.

Mandy is the story of a girl who loves maps: "She had maps of the moon, maps of the world, maps of countries and maps of towns." Inquisitive about how her town might look from the air, Mandy unfolds a map of the town, sits upon it and tell it to fly. It does! Mandy swoops over the fire station where the fire fighters offer to save the little girl from the 'runaway' map; flies through the post office where the postman tries to stamp it 'airmail'; sails over a bakeshop where the baker sets his cat to catch the map. Mandy assures them all that she is quite capable of looking out for herself. Her exploration of the world give Mandy (and her readers) a new perspective on her community and its people.

Then she climbs high into the sky to touch a cloud, where she discovers "it's not a bit like a marshmallow." On returning home, Mandy decides that next time there will be room for a friend on her travelling map.

Glimpses of the life of an amiable loser

If You Hum a Few Bars
I might remember the tune
by Don Bailey
Oberon Press

This is a set of stories about Gus.

Who Gus? It's hard to say. He never seems to be the same guy twice—sometimes, Guy peddles magazines door to door; sometimes he's a social worker. About 27, he's usually divorced or about to be divorced from his wife; sometimes he has one daughter, sometimes two. But it doesn't really matter that he's different people, because in reality, he's always the same—a passive person being worked over by existence.

Gus had what our parents used to call "potential". But he didn't fall for any of that old stuff about making the best use of his talents and planning for the future. No sir. Why bother mortgaging the present to finance the future you may not want to face anyway?

("If you got it today, you don't wear it tomorrow, man," Janis Joplin told the crowd in 1970. "Cause as a matter of fact, as I discovered on the train man, tomorrow never happens." Nice advice, but not true. Living for the present doesn't free you from the future—it just means someone else makes the decision for you.)

Gus goes along with these decisions that he never really makes; he rolls with the proverbial punches. Once he played in a band and maybe could have been a good singer, but whiskey's ruined his voice, and ...what the hell, anyway. He doesn't particularly want to get divorced, but it just begins to happen, so he might as well go along with it.

After all, it's easier to go along, just as Gus goes along with the blond in the steam bath who offers to massage away his hangover ("I felt foolish wanting to refuse. Something about it didn't seem right, but I didn't want to offend him.") We're not surprised, (and Gus shouldn't have been if he'd thought about it) when the friendly amateur masseur clamps his mouth around our hero's penis.

Gus isn't out-and-out failure; but at 27, he does have the reek of a second-rate—someone who is just coming to the realization that he's blown it. The book follows the unfolding to Gus of his own situation.

But it's a situation he can never fully understand, otherwise he wouldn't be Gus: author Bailey only permits him glimpses, feelings, intuitions. To Bailey's credit, the method works. Too often the character incapable of articulating his own situation becomes a literary cliché, an incomprehensible who passes on only incomprehensibilities to the reader. "Man" we could say, "that's just like life — incomprehensible," but it would hardly be worth saying. Bailey's better than that: neither Gus nor we can clearly understand what Gus' life means, but we both are given a sideways glance at it.

And sometimes, that's the best you can do.

The happy hairdresser

The average American woman between the ages of eighteen and eighty spends approximately two and a half hours per week in the neighborhood beauty salon with her favourite hair stylist, who more often than not is a man. It is estimated that she manages to spend at least $6 per visit.

Well, not me, nor, unfortunately, am I one of those "hot-ass Lolitas" (daughters of regular clients) who are "high on booze, sex or drugs—occasionally all three" and "are easier to make than females in any other age group."

So perhaps I should be humbled by my task of reviewing "the intimate memoirs" of The Happy Hairdresser, one Nicholas Loupos of London, Ontario.

Instead, I'm insulted by the two Varsity staffers who handed me these 175 pages of crap because they thought it would be "right up my alley." I should only shove it up theirs...

Under alluring chapter headings such as "Shampoo, Set and Sex," "Fairy Nice Hairdressers" and "This is your local Mafia representative speaking...," Loupos, a hairdresser for 12 years, presents "the book in which Canadian women let down their hair" in a style bestowing literary merit on The Sensuous Woman.

I hope that he really isn't Canadian, but merely an expatriate American trying to cash in on the nationalist market here who found a publisher greedy enough to risk it.

He always uses American statistics (unsubstantiated, naturally) and when speaking of Toronto's annual hairdressers' convention tells us:

You can choose from plain little Sally who has made the trip all the way from Dullsville, Ontario, to a chic fashion model from Chicago. ...hardly a statement to get him on our side. He does try to redeem himself by references to the Canadian language, rather than English, throughout.

I also try to escape the reality of this book by assuming that only sociology majors writing on either hairdressers or bigots will read it. Loupos capitalizes on every myth every bigot wants embedded in your mind.

For example, back at the same hairdressers' convention:

Especially well represented are the people from such fairy-producing professions as clothing industries, decorating, the theatre and the arts.

But he has to give those "confused" souls credit where credit is due.

The funny thing is, the more queer the guy, the better hair stylist he makes. Brother, am I glad I'm not that much talented....

No kidding.

He knows you sympathize with the mythology and are laughing right along with him. So you're ready for an equally amusing view of lesbians.

Books and films on Lesbianism try to portray these people as ordinary human beings who just happen to be a bit more confused than the rest of us; the message is lost to me, I'm afraid....I've found from personal experience that they are the most ignorant, self-centred, twisted clients of all the people I have to deal with.

That's followed by the memorable episode in which he goes home with a customer Miss 38-22-36 only to find out that she is a lesbian and watch her slowly dissolve in his mind's eye to Miss 18-40-50.

It's almost as original as informing us that religious fanatics refer to hell as "H.E. double tooth-picks."

Loupos begins the book with six basic categories of clients, all desiring some type of sexual illusion with the hairdresser. He continually emphasizes the fact that he is Greek and Greeks make great lovers, of course — we are referred to Xaviera Hollander for confirmation — but he lets his national pride down long enough to say that:

Greek females have what I consider the worst heads of hair of any ethnic group in western Ontario with the possible exception of Iroquois Indians.

In addition:

Greek females — especially recent arrivals — are harder for a man to lay horizontal than a role of cold linoleum.

Which is suspiciously like what I heard about nice Jewish girls back in Oshawa when I was one of them there....

The one thing all women have in common besides a universal desire to lay their hairdresser is — you guessed it, I mean we all know the answer — inability in politics. Speaking of topics he avoids in the salon, Loupos says:

One is the subject of politics, which one cannot logically discuss with women for the simple reason that they are not politically inclined.

And Loupos wants us to know that he is a serious writer. Not only is the epigram by John Steinbeck, but there is also this gem:

"After a few sips, Giuseppe asked, 'you're Graco, right?' I nodded affirmation of my Hellenic heritage.

Nodded affirmation of...nodded affirmation...the same guy who, pages earlier in a hospital emergency room trying to tell a nurse what's wrong with his friend who has VD but doesn't speak English well enough to explain himself, flaunts a lengthy string of epithets searching for the Greek word for it, before he realizes the word he wants is "penis".

The book is dedicated to his ulcer. This is dedicated to mine.

Bonnie Raitt shows the style that makes her albums a treat in belting out a blues song.

Women in music: one up, one down, and lots more to come

One of the more puzzling enigmas of the music business is the limited success of female singers. Folk, rock and jazz forms are completely dominated by males. The number of women who have achieved success is comparatively miniscule, and it isn't for lack of effort.

But lately, more women have been attempting to reach that select circle of chanteuses that includes Joni Mitchell, Joan Baez, Judy Collins, Carole King, Laura Nyro and Carly Simon.

Linda Ronstadt has been kicking about music circles for about six years now. She started her career as the lead singer of the California based folk rock trio, The Stone Poneys. You may remember the group's only hit, a tune called "Different Drum" penned by ex-Monkee, Michael Nesmith. There was almost no public response to the three albums that followed or even to Ronstadt's two solo albums.

But Linda has made a few friends in sunny California including Neil Young (she sang "Heart of Gold" with James Taylor) and Asylum Record president, David Geffen. No doubt it was through these associations that she got the chance to record her latest album.

Don't Cry now is a low-keyed, country-flavoured album. It features an impressive array of talented backup musicians including Sneaky Pete, Spooner Oldham, Glenn Frey, Chris Ethridge, Russ Kunkly, Lee Sklar and Jim Gordon. Production was handled by another Asylum artist John David Souther who also contributed some acoustic guitar and three compositions.

I tried hard to like this album, but I kept asking myself what Ronstadt had to offer. Her voice is pleasant but not outstanding and she doesn't compose, arrange or play an instrument. The material was chosen from a wide variety of writers but almost all of it has seen more impressive performances. The Eric Katz/Libby Titus song, "Love has no pride" is one of the better tunes on the album but Bonnie Raitt's version is still heads above it.

There seems to be a general lack of real emotional input or perhaps insincerity in Linda's voice. The string arrangements by Jimmie Haskell (who usually works for RCA) do little more than drench each song in a sugary mire.

The only tunes that really work well are the Eagles' song "Desperado" and the title song, composed by Souther.

Bonnie Raitt's latest vinyl offering, Takin' My Time makes up for any of Linda Ronstadt's shortcomings almost fourfold. It's her third LP, and that makes three out of three superlative albums for the twenty-two year old Boston area resident.

Each album has represented a step of sorts. The first one was recorded in Dave Ray's garage near Minneapolis, the second in the Bearsview studios and this latest one, in Hollywood. Takin' My Time does differ from the previous albums in major ways. There's a de-emphasis of blues material (which is sad because that's what Bonnie does best), there are no Raitt compositions and there is less of Bonnie's masterful guitar work.

Musicians this time feature most of the time LA band Little Feat including Lowell George on slide guitar, Bill Payne on piano, Paul Barrère on rhythm guitar and Sam Clayton on congas. Other luminaries on hand were Taj Mahal helping out on harp and guitar, Freebo, her long time bass player, and producer John Hall on guitar. (Hall composed the song "Half Moon" that was recorded by Janis Joplin on Pearl.)

Bonnie continues to revive good old rock songs and give exposure to unestablished songwriters. The record opens with an old Martha and the Vandellas' tune "You've Been In Love Too Long". It's a funky stomper with an infectious bass riff. The other piece of nostalgia is "Let Me In" (wee-oo). The old recording by The Sensations never had as determined a vocal line, or as brash a horn section as this one.

Four of the composers whose works brightened the Give It Up album are represented again, and the quality of the writing is compelling in its brilliance. Eric Katz, Joel Zoss and Chris Smith should all be better known on the strength of their respective contributions. Fortunately, Jackson Browne is already collecting some well deserved kudos for his two LP's.

Being more partial to Raitt's blues treatments, I'm most satisfied with the smooth as sherry version of Mose Allison's "Everybody's Cryin' Mercy" and a fine Randy Newman song called "Guilty". Bonnie finally gets to cut loose on slide guitar in a tribute to the great bluesman Mississippi Fred McDowell, with the medley, "Write Me a Few of Your Lines/Kokomo Blues".

Takin' My Time is a good album and it serves to underscore the talent of Bonnie Raitt as a guitarist and vocal and musical interpreter. And by all means, check out her first two albums.

Gershwin tribute stands out in ragtime craze

Piano Music of George Gershwin
William Bolcom, piano
None Nonesuch H-71248

Riding the current ragtime nostalgia craze is this new disc of Gershwin tunes, ably performed on the good ol' piano (remember that, Mellotron fans?). In fact, this is Gershwin's year, being the 75th anniversary of his birth, and since record companies usually get off their collective behinds and record neglected works to commemorate the occasion, I guess we all get birthday presents on the happy day.

Ever since Joshua Rifkin released his record of Scott Joplin piano rags (Nonesuch H-71248) a couple of years ago, the taste for raga has grown in a simply phenomenal way. Now, with the new Redford-Newman movie ("The Sting") using one of Joplin's orchestrated rags for theme music, there's every reason to expect its popularity to climb to the same levels as Strauss' "Zarathustra". Hopefully, we'll be spared "modern" versions of ragtime from Emir Parasito and his colleagues, but that's just my own opinion. I'm sure there are many of you who actually like that sort of stuff, as well as Walter Keane paintings, Black Magic chocolates, the Toronto Sun, and... well, back to the review.

One side of the Gershwin disc is devoted to the "George Gershwin Songbook", an item published in 1932. In it, Gershwin introduced many of his popular songs, and on the accompanying pages gave his own variations on them. As a result, the version of "I Got Rhythm" we hear isn't a tired old piano arrangement, but rather a sprightly dashing throw-away for a pianist who really has technique to spare. Eighteen of these miniatures are on the first side, from "Swanee" to "Who Cares?", and each is a delight. The second side is genuine ragtime stuff, usually ignored for reasons that are a mystery to me. "Rialto Ripples" starts off the side, a wonderful rag composed in 1916. Taken on its own, it's fine stuff, but when you realize that Gershwin composed it at the tender age of 17, you're taken aback.

Ragtime fans will have this one already, I'm sure. I fyou haven't yet indulged in this happy, carefree music, then get this one right away. William Bolcom has taken great care to edit out the pedal markings which Gershwin's editors saw fit to put in - they only muddled up the crackling rhythms in the process. And, needless to say, he has the zippy technique to make these pieces sound exactly as they should - effortless.

Topping it all off is the happy combination of good pressing, informative liner notes (for a change!) and excellent price. It lists at a mere $3.50, and judicious shopping can put it on your turntable for less than $2.50. Vinyl shortage notwithstanding, this has to be the best buy in ages.

It takes a certain amount of guts to produce a record of modern piano music in today's vinyl-scarce market. Fans of contemporary music aren't exactly legion, and far too many recent releases have been outright turkeys. If a record has to meet the requirement of good sales to be released in today's market, then it has to be a winner. Well, it's nice to see that one record company isn't afraid to buck this trend and go out on a limb with a different, experimental-music disc. As luck would have it, it's a flop—but with an ironic twist.

Side one of this new release features Michael Tilson Thomas (the wonderboy conductor of the Buffalo Symphony) and Ralph Grierson in a performance of the most hair-raising, viciously difficult two-piano work I've ever heard. John Cage penned the "Three Dances for Two amplified, prepared Pianos" in 1944, and it spotlights the incredible resources of the souped-up keyboard.

Between the strings are studded nails, bolts, washers, rubber bumpers, every conceivable sort of hardware, all according to a carefully worked out chart supplied by the composer. The resulting sound is like a percussion orchestra at the pianist's fingertips, and in the hands of an expert, the music played on this weird set-up can be utterly thrilling. The dances sound like Mexican or Colombian primitive music, with the final movement an almost nine-minute blast of high-speed demons. Both Grierson and Thomas strut their stuff with tremendous spirit, and the close-in recorded sound makes this the most danceable John Cage work ever pressed.

The other side consists of one work, Steve Reich's "Four Organs", for that number of keyboard instruments and one Maracas player. Lasting over 25 minutes, it is as stupefyingly mind-numbingly boring as the Cage is thrilling. Plain and simple explanation of the piece leaves one wondering why it was ever composed in the first place: one chord is played by all four organists, and to the continuous shaking of maracas it is repeated until the piece is over. The only variation is in the tempo and sharing of the notes by the musicians. A continuous tape loop would have been just as good. The endless repetition of one chord makes this the most one-tally-centered piece since Stockhausen's "Stimmung". As a matter of fact, Reich was probably heavily influenced by the latter's work, which beats the threat of boredom by employing human voices instead of electronic tones, thereby introducing an element of interhuman identification into the music.

The terrible irony involved with the disc should be clear — one of the finest modern piano works of the past 30 years has been coupled with an opus so boring that your amplifier may fall asleep during its playing. I'd be quite tempted to say that the record is worth the money for the Cage side alone, but with disc costs above the $5 mark for what appears to be all time now (unless you shop around) I can't take it seriously as a good buy. Still, pianists may buy it for that first side — it'll leave you wondering how they can attain that incredible speed without their fingers falling off.

Shubert sonatas mix introspection and light melodies

Schubert: Piano Sonata in G Major, Op. 78
Vladimir Ashkenazy
London CS6820

Yet another polished disc from the star of London's solo roster, Vladimir Ashkenazy. It's hard to believe that one musician can play so convincingly in works from Mozart to some bitchin' Prokofiev (as they might say in American Graffiti) and still have time for this transcendent, introspective sonata.

Schubert was a contemporary of Beethoven (dying only a year after the master) but was an entirely different sort of person. It must be understood that Beethoven towered over his fellows in Vienna much as he towers over all composers today. He was a formidable personality, even when totally deaf. Schubert, a shy man to begin with, didn't want to be put into a confrontation with the great man, so he kept his musical talents for a group of select friends, usually displaying them at private gatherings.

Even today, most people tend to forget his incredible productivity and the flow of melody which must have been his constant companion. After all, a composer doesn't write over 600 songs, eight symphonies, dozens of sonatas, chamber works and incidental pieces in a life of only 31 years without something special going for him. His real gift, so the books say, was melody, and perhaps no other composer has written such magnificently beautiful ones. Yet he wasn't all on the surface, as even one listening to the G Major Sonata will show.

Written in 1826, the Sonata begins with a long Fantasie movement, running about 20 minutes. Melodies abound, but the whole is permeated by a mood of introspection and solitude. Great rainy day stuff. The other remaining three movements are lighter, happier portions, but the last one ends with a quiet restatement of the theme — a nice touch.

There's not much to really say about Ashkenazy's performance. Doubtlessly it's note-perfect, and the sound (miked rather closely) gives the recording a nice, warm edge; romantic piano works are simply his meat, and all we have to do is marvel at his playing them. I'd personally like to hear a Horowitz recording of the work, or one by Rubenstein, if he's still able to record these days. Of course, RCA may be just sitting on one in their familiar pig-headed way. All the same, Vladimir gets top marks again for this lovely disc.

If you've walked barefoot on sand or soil you know how great it is. Your heels sink low and your feet embrace the earth. Then you put on your shoes, return to the city, and become another concrete fighter... but the concrete always wins. You

On the conclusion of each Year.
When Christmas comes with plenteous cheer,
At breaking up the Youths so gay:
Enjoy their annual holiday.

Taken from a Christmas Gambo! of 1820 the above is a reminder that things aren't what they used to be. Neither was the Toronto theatre circuit over the holidays but for you youths so gay still looking for a little play there is some chance of regrieve around town. After a highly successful production of Look Back in Anger, the Performing Theatre Company have chosen Arthur Miller's Death Of A Salesman as their second show. Coinciding with the twenty-fifth anniversary of its Broadway premiere, performances preview January 14 and 15, with the opening January 16 at the Palmerston (Avenue) Library Theatre. The show will run Thursday through Sunday at 8:30 for five weeks.

Factory Theatre Lab, having returned from a festival of Canadian plays in London, England, opened again in Toronto with a production called Ms. America. The play centres on the interaction between an aging beauty queen and a journalist, examining the perverse nature of a society whose values are based on glamour, deceit and manipulation. Still without a permanent home of their own, the Lab will be performing at the New Theatre at the Bathurst St. United Church. Tuesdays are pay-what-you-can. Wednesday, Thursday and Sunday, student tickets are $2.00. Friday and Saturday students pay $2.50.

David Freeman's third play You're Gonna Be Alright Jamie Boy opens Saturday January 12 at the Tarragon Theatre. Departing from the bitter realism and black humour of Creeps and Battering Ram, this work is styled as an uproarious situation comedy giving an inside view of a T.V. Guide world. Sunday at 2:30 are pay-what-you-can. The Toronto Pixie Capers, a collection of zany sketches by the talented Ken Campbell, opened this week at Theatre Passe Muraille. Destined for destruction in three weeks by Eaton's demolition derby, this production is the swan song for the atmospheric theatre at 11 Trinity Square. May she rest in pieces. And at the St. Lawrence Centre Arthur Pinero's Victorian melodrama Trelawny of the Wells (about a would-be-actress who chooses show biz over marriage in the days when it just wasn't done) is currently in performance.

On campus the Studio Theatre at 4 Glenmorris St. gives three arguments for the theatre—Cannabaliem, Sex and A Dead Dog—in the form of two plays by Brecht, The Beggar of The Dead Dog and Lux In Tebebris, and one by Mrozek, Out At Sea. The show runs until tomorrow night and is free. Call 928-8705 for reservations.

classical

Welcome back to the grind, O Grub-bles, there's plenty to do this month if live music's yer interest. See if you can bump off a ticket holder to tonight's concert of the Amici Trio at St. Lawrence, part of their "Connoisseur Series", because that's the only way you'll get a ticket.

Tomorrow evening at 7:30, the Toronto Symphony gives one of its enormously popular Family Pop concerts, featuring pianist Adrienne Shannon in the Grieg Concerto. Shannon, a graduate of our own Faculty of Music, shares the bill with conductor Victor Feldbrill in performances of Rossini's Barber of Seville overture, excerpts from Walton's "Facade" suite, and works by Barber and Tchaikovsky. This is ideal stuff for the newcomer to classical music, the kind of music made popular at Ontario Place in the TSO's summer concert series...and with a top seat price of $4, you can afford to go first class. On the cheap side, 100 rush seats go for $1.50 at 5 pm at the box office.

Next Tuesday and Wednesday, the TSO is led by Elmer Iseler and joined by his Mendelssohn Choir in performances of Hönninger's "King David", an exciting and popular work. The program is repeated on Friday, and all performances are at 8:30 at Massey Hall, tickets $3-9, with rush seats at $1.50.

The Edward Johnson Building (as usual) comes alive with plenty of shows this week. On Monday at 5:15 Richard Klason (clarinet) gives a recital, as does John Keane (tenor). Both performances are free, and part of the Faculty's ongoing series of student recitals. These shows are often a good bet, and a chance to see the leading lights in solo performance. Tuesday night sees the Faculty of Music Percussion Ensemble, led by John Wyre. This should be quite a spectacular performance, if previous occasions are any indication. This one's free, too. Wednesday night at 8:15 is the time for another recital, this one featuring Sheila Laughton, 'cello, in the concert hall. Wrapping up the week is a performance in the Thursday Scholarship Concert series, featuring the Orford Quartet, flautist Robert Aitken and soprano Roxolana Roslak in music by Respighi, Tchaikovsky and Mozart. This is one of many professional performances given in this series and at $1.50 a crack for students well worth the money. 8:30 in the concert hall. Coming up: the Opera school's presentation of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" on the 23rd, 25th, 26th and 28th—get your tickets now.

Marvin Karon, Terry Slater, Maarten van Dijk, Robert Morgan, and Fred Ford rehearse for Peer Gynt, opening at Hart House January 17 and running to January 26.

As usual the CBC provides tons of fun for radio fans—check the FM Guide, as space doesn't permit us to go over everything.

There's a lot more doing these days, and you don't have to go very far to find it. One series most of us are waiting for, though, is the National Ballet's spring(?) season, Feb. 13 to Mar. 2. I only mention it now to warn of probably massive ticket rushes; Rudolf Nureyev will be back in town for an unprecedented season with the Company, dancing in "Don Juan" (a new work by John Neumeier), "Giselle", "Les Sylphides", last season's smasheroo "Sleeping Beauty" and yet another work not yet announced. Just why this great artist chooses to dance so much with the National Ballet is not quite clear (could it be money?) but one shouldn't look a gift piroquette in the slippers, I guess. We may not have a Dylan, but he's as close as Balletomanes can come to an all-out superstar of legendary quality.

movies

Christmas brings a flotilla of big, highly advertised, new movies that, each year, swamps a few good ones released at the same time but with minimal publicity, — the distributors' bolt being shot on the big box-office guns. Sunk this time was Robert Altman's great, funny private-eye movie (and movies movie) The Long Goodbye. The double-bill with Elektra Glide in Blue (ugh) at the Fairlawn may be your last chance to see what can still be done with and to the old Hollywood conventions. If you are not in a rush, though, there is no danger, because this one is bound to be revived eternally as soon as a decent period of mourning passes. Mean Streets (see the review inside) looks like it will be the other casualty of the season, so if you plan to go, go quick.

Jan Troell's The New Land, however, is doing crack business at the International, which is as it should be for the second installment of the best movie we've ever seen. More about it and its first half, The Emigrants, next week. For now, today, Saturday and Sunday you Social notes: The lady at Warner Bros. suggested we avoid the evening showings of The Exorcist because of the noise in the theatre. Before we could figure that out, a friend warned us to watch the aisles on the way out because people were throwing up. Then another friend told us that there was a long, long line-up waiting for the two o'clock matinee last Tuesday. And a friend who went opening night — "vile" was the word he used for the film — pointed out that he passed the theatre several days later and the admission price had been boosted from $3 to $3.50. It looks like a long wait for the revival of Wee Geordie.

rock

Fiddler's Green, (489-3001) features the country and blues sounds of Don Audet and Richard Baker tonight. Contemporary songwriter Peter Baughen is on hand on Tuesday.

Laurence Hud is at the Riverboat tonight through Sunday. Electric composer, conductor musician, David Aram opens on Tuesday.

The Downchild Blues Band is still holding on at the El Mocambo, Spadina below College, till tomorrow. The soft sounds of Ronnie Abramson are featured downstairs, and Grover Washington starts his one week stint on Monday.

Now that Bob Dylan and the Band have come to Toronto, conquered it, and left (with over $200,000), it's time to look at upcoming concert events. The first one of interest is Murray McLoughlin's Massey Hall debut on Saturday January 26. Miles Davis is scheduled for the following evening. Paul Butterfield's Better Days is slated for Convocation Hall on February 15. And the English band Yes returns to Maple Leaf Gardens on February 26 (a new double album, "Tales From The Tobergraphic Ocean", should be available within a week).

Master Session, Moe Koffman, (GRT; $6.29)

Flautist Moe Koffman approaches his music in much the same spirit that the record industry did in the fifties — if you find a successful formula, stick to it.

Koffman found a ready market for his first adaptation of classical music, "Moe Koffman Plays Bach". Then came a double LP of Vivaldi's "The Four Seasons". Master Session is a widening of scope that includes adaptations of the works of several composers — Grieg, Bartok, Gluck, Mozart, Debussy and Berlioz. Almost all of the musicians appeared on the other two LP's. The composition credits (except for Bartok's "Intermezzo") are given to Koffman and Toronto keyboard artist Doug Riley. Riley (of the band Dr. Music) produced and arranged the record as well and it's his album as much as Koffman's. Most of the pieces start out quiet and subdued, with only a few instruments playing the familiar theme. When the framework is established, drums are added and the process of "jazzing up" the theme begins. There's a lot of fine soloing by Koffman, Riley and bassist Don Thompson and at least one good guitar break by Terry Bush on a reworking of Grieg's "Hall of the Mountain Kings", called "Cavern of the Mountain Trolls".

This is not a record for serious music listeners though. Too much of Koffman's background in muzak, and Riley's in radio and TV commercials, seeps onto Master Session. It's admittedly more avant garde than its predecessors, but it's still little more than background music for a cocktail party.

Gazette outrages Catholics

HALIFAX (CUP) — The Halifax City Police and the Nova Scotia Human Rights Commission are investigating the Dalhousie Gazette here for possible libel and blasphemy.

The investigation centres around an article in their Christmas issue, "The Miracle Worker" which is a parody on the birth of Christ.

The Gazette co-editor, Ken McDougall, said he was notified by a member of the city morality and drug squad that they were being investigated. Sargent Art Wyatt called, informing them of the investigation and wanting to know who the author and publisher were. The story was published under a nom-de-plume.

The paper has refused to reveal the name of the author and says they will continue to do so.

The Nova Scotia Human Rights Commission is investigating the matter following a complaint from the Advocate General of the Roman Catholic Church. The Church claims that the article discriminates against members of their faith.

The Halifax police refuse to reveal who registered the complaint with them.

Mike Gardner, president of the Dalhousie Students Union, publisher of the Gazette, claims that there is as much discrimination in regards to the application of the law, and on that ground, says he will support the Gazette.

He does, however, feel that an apology might appease those offended by the article and says "it might be worth a candle to apologize."

The Halifax morality squad was not available for comment.

Interfac sports get underway

By BOB PRITCHARD
Basketball

In Division 1A action, St. Mike's A maintained their hold on first place with a 92-79 defeat of Trin A. Trafford led the victors with 22 points, while Wright and Foster put in good performances for Trin hitting 23 and 24 points respectively. Vic I remained hot on St. Mike's heels, defeating Scar 62-58. John had 16 points for Vic in that game. PHE A recorded their first win of the season by taking Law 55-48. Visca led the Jocks with 16 points.

In the second division, PHE C remained undefeated, this time taking Dents A 42-33.

In the B part of the league, Pharm moved into a first place tie with a 51-17 stuffing of Law 11 and a 70-21 trouncing of New B. Vaicius led the Pharmacists on both occasions, counting 16 and 20 points respectively. Tied with Pharm are Innis, who got 14 points from Rosenberg to defeat Trin B 45-39, and Dents B, who bounced Law 11 50-10. In another game, Meds B picked up 2 points when PHE D defaulted to them.

Tonight, at 9:30 in Hart House, Division 1A leading St. Mike's A takes on Division 1B leading SGS.

Volleyball

Division 11 playoffs begin next Tuesday with four games being played that evening. At 7:00, Eng 111 take on St. Mike's. Eng earned that spot by downing For B 15-11 and 15-9 earlier this week.

St. Mike's ended the regular schedule in a first place tie with Pharm. Emmanuel slid into the opening spot against Pharm when Erin 11 defaulted their preliminary match. That game starts at 10:00.

At 8:00, For A meets New, and at 9:00, Grads take on Trin. The next round of the tournament will take place two nights later on Thursday 17th.

In continuing regular play in division 1, league leading Scarborough narrowly edged by Eng 11 16-14, 8-15 and 16-14. In the only other game, Dents A defaulted to Eng 1.

This is hockey Is that a fac?

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Interfac hockey got underway for the spring term with Vic 1 skipping by SMC A 3-1. Biblich, Richmond and Smith drilled one each for Vic while Sibbit gave the losers something to cheer about.

Fac Ed taught a pedagogical lesson to Vic 11, winning 4-3. Deporter, Bell and Tappe danced by McKenzie and Hanny scored enough to give the teachers a win.

New 1 visited Grad 1 for a pleasant social outing. A good time was had by all except the Grads who lost 3-0. The fashionable Carew cut a hat-trick for himself.

The boys of Erin took the Law into their hands and before they let them out again, Wilson, Chyrinski, Perku, and Sly had given them a 4-3 win. Morrison, Bauer and Morrison replied for Law. (But what did they reply? Well, this is a good family newspaper so we won't tell you.)

Law 11 thrashed the money-makers from Mgt Studies 6-0. (If you had to study Mgt's, you would feel like scoring either.) While strongarmed two goals and Armstrong got another. O'Keefe barrelled one in to round out the scoring.

SMC B religiously converted Jr. Eng to the idea of losing 4-0. Hamilton, Michach, Platt and Mallahen anointed the junior skulene's net with one goal each.

PHE A added a new dimension to human misery when they whipped the Sr. Eng 8-0. Ackley, Taylor, Cruke, Wright and Scansen should take full moral responsibility for the untold suffering they caused by scoring so often.

Pharm A defeated the school of hard Knox 3-1. Hetherington, Walker and Lebold (with him on your team, who's afraid?) got their cognomens inscribed on the scoresheet for the winners. Needless to say, Henderson was awarded the same privilege for the losers. McCausland earned himself a minor penalty for not wearing a mouthguard and a major for not guarding his mouth.

If a tie is like kissing your sister, then Innis 1 probably ended up with a mouth full of splinters Wednesday evening. They drew 4-4 with For A. Being sociable for Innis was Bukowski, Hanson, Hosick and Boddy. Getting the hockey pucker up the ice and into the Innis net was taken care of by several foresters—Macaulay, Bouris and Galoway.

The scoresheet also said a two minute penalty was given to the forestry bench. Unfortunately, after the bench was dragged across the ice and put in the penalty box, many of the players had no place to sit.

PHE B waterkedged behind Grad 11's motorboards, and then, mixing metaphors, skated by them in hockey 7-0. Scoring for PHE B were Cogswell and Downs (each with a hat-trick) and Yonekura who did not have a hat-trick, or even a coat rack but at least he had a goal.

Don't leave—we're not through yet. If you want to see your name spelled correctly for the rest of the year, get your team manager to write your name in some semblance of legibility on the scoresheets.

Otherwise you will be doomed to going down in posterity as "Kricklewich" when your name is really "Kricklewich" and you'll have nothing to show your grandchildren when you get old and hobbled...

B'ball Blues trounce York

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

The Varsity Blues basketball team boosted its record to 4-1 Tuesday night, blasting York 88-58. Playing at York, Toronto broke their opponent's usually good press and piled up a dizzying 43-19 half-time lead.

The Blues then used a zone defence for the first time this season to shut off the dispirited and chaotic York offence.

Did practicing two hours a day in the empty Benson Building over the holidays help the Blues?

Coach John McManus heartily agreed. "It sure did. People don't realize how small Hart House is compared to a regulation sized gym. It's like the difference between day and night."

"Because Hart House is so small", continued McManus, "our players can develop bad habits. For example, the court isn't very wide and you can cover your man as well as someone else's around the basket. A habit like that can hurt you when you get out on a large floor where there's lots of room."

Practicing regularly in Hart House can also upset a player's shooting in a larger gym, said McManus.

But it was York who suffered from woefully inadequate shooting in Tuesday's game while the Blues were hot.

McManus dressed 12 players for this game and all but two got on the scoresheet. York's top shooter didn't even get into trouble figures.

"But," cautioned McManus, "we're not 30 points better than them. We just caught them on a bad night when everything was going wrong for them."

Blues play Laurentian in Sudbury this weekend.

"If we can win this one," said McManus, "we'll really be flying."

Soviet Union banned from World Cup

tion replied:

"FIFA abided by the rules of the World Cup Competition which are explicit. This association cannot oppose a decision which was based solely on the World Cup regulations, and not on politics."

"FIFA is a soccer organization, not the guardian of any political movement or philosophy. I do not believe FIFA is pro Chile or anti Soviet.

"Its officers have apparently been convinced following on site inspections, that the national stadium in Chile was suitable to host the scheduled World Cup game.

"Since Chile had played a game in the USSR, the latter were now required to play the return match in Chile."

In reply, the committee said the association "has closed its eyes to terror and brutality" by its stand.

The committee argued that using a stadium which held over 7,000 prisoners only two weeks before the scheduled match "would be a travesty of sporting ideals which FIFA and the CSA claim to uphold." They pointed out that politics had forced FIFA to change sites before, such as in Ireland, where a World Cup game was switched.

Colleges haven't decided on future

By MARINA STRAUSS

University president John Evans will have to wait longer than he intended for the federated colleges - Victoria, Trinity and St. Michael's - to give him a decisive response to his October proposals on the role of the colleges.

Although Evans had hoped to hear the colleges' decisions by Friday, the heads of all downtown campus federated and constituent colleges and Erindale College walked away from a closed meeting with the president with no specific solutions as yet.

The closest thing to a decision reached at Friday's meeting was to set up a committee to draw up a progress report to be submitted to the academic affairs committee at its next meeting January 22, Evans confirmed in an interview.

Evans' working paper proposes extensive shifts in the legal, academic and fiscal responsibilities in the college system.

Yet the college representatives generally felt optimistic and heartened after Friday's meeting.

"I feel encouraged by the meeting," Trinity College provost George Ignatieff said. "There's a better chance of agreement than before. There was some real effort of understanding, and there's enough common interests (among the colleges) to see that something emerges."

St. Michael's College president John Kelly echoed this feeling. "The federated colleges and the university came closer together than ever before," he said.

"I think this will work out," Kelly predicted.

Ignatieff noted all the colleges agreed on the academic objectives of Evans' paper.

"We agree the colleges should be made more academically useful and should offer a wider choice of programs," Ignatieff explained.

It is the mechanism of achieving this goal on which the colleges differ, he emphasizes.

In simplified form, Evans' paper proposes centralizing the present college subjects into university departments and teaching sections of the present department courses at the colleges.

French, English, Classics, German and religious studies are subjects taught in and by the colleges whereas the university has set up central departments for subjects, such as history, political economy, and the social and physical sciences.

Evans' proposals would create central departments for all subjects. The new system would pose particular problems for the three federated colleges. These colleges have their own governing bodies while the constituent colleges are responsible only to the Governing Council.

"You see, it's like this, president Evans has promised me Buckminster Fuller, Daniel Berrigan, Thomas Aquinas and a lively pack of Waldensians for some minor considerations."

Unlike the constituent colleges, New, University and Innis the federated colleges hire their own staff for the college subjects. The constituent colleges do, nevertheless, advise the university on the choice of their own staff.

Evans' proposals would allow the university to cross-appoint teaching staff, from the central departments into the colleges allowing a wider range of resources for each subject.

This is precisely the thorny question the colleges cannot iron out. As Ignatieff pointed out, the retention of the right of appointment is the biggest concern of the federated colleges.

"We agreed any changes cannot be imposed by a centralized decision," he said. "We haven't accepted the president's plan and the president hasn't accepted the colleges'."

Ignatieff felt before Friday's meeting the issue was blanketed in a cloak of confusion. "We didn't know what was involved," he admitted.

Evans pointed out his goal is "to decentralize the educational program."

He explained the creation of central departments in college subjects would be a "functional pooling, not a physical pooling of resources."

"It is an attempt to co-ordinate functionally the needs of the subjects," he maintained.

Ignatieff sees the main advantage of Evans' scheme as "a flexible system that will make sure teaching comes to the college in fair shares, in proportion to our faculty and not to the number of students."

"I hope we'll be able to earn more money by doing more teaching," he asserted.

Trinity is feeling the pinch of the current university financial squeeze more sharply than the other colleges. Money is now allocated according to head counts in the colleges and not to how much teaching is done.

Ignatieff noted even last month's provincial increases of just over $1.3 million to the three U of T federated, church-related colleges, effective September 1974, will not alleviate Trinity's present financial problems.

Trinity will receive the smallest proportion of that sum, since it has the smallest enrolment; St. Mike's will receive the greatest share of the money.

"All faculty should have equal chances to do their share of teaching at all levels, graduate and undergraduate," Ignatieff maintained.

The greatest apprehension and hesitancy to Evans' recommendations comes from Victoria president G.S. French.

Referring to the proposal to pool resources through university departments, he argued: "I'm not sympathetic to that."

French expressed "a great deal of concern to the desirability of moving towards centrality."

"Resources are already pooled," he contended. "A student can take a course anywhere he wants," although he added: "He should be encouraged to stay at his own college if the course is available there."

Because of the drop in enrolment in its college subjects, Victoria sent a letter to all its first year students early last fall urging them to enrol in college subjects.

In recent years students have shown a marked preference to university subjects.

French said he considered Friday's meeting "useful and constructive. It is conceivable that something can be worked out."

SMC president John Kelly ponders the future of the plans for centralization. Visions of sugarplums appear . . .

Parity returns again

The Governing Council's academic affairs parity sub-committee formed under heavy student pressure in November to determine methods of student representation on departmental hiring, staffing and tenure committees, is planning to meet for the first time this week.

An exact date has not been chosen.

Sub-committee chairman M.E. Barten explained the delays in getting the meetings underway are an inevitable part of the democratic process and reflect no conspiracy on the part of committee members to shove the issue aside.

SAC President Bob Anderson was not impressed by the delay in the deliberations of the sub-committee.

He charged it was either "a deliberate administration attempt to stall debate on student representation or reflects their inability to deal with the question".

Anderson said last night SAC had foreseen this problem and urged academic affairs in October to set up an ad-hoc committee of students and faculty able to meet immediately and report as soon as possible.

He said a committee like this could have met within two weeks and started to debate the question.

Anderson said discipline was more immediate and though the issue of staffing has faded from the public eye it "is more important in the long run."

Although academic affairs adopted a resolution approving the sub-committee Nov. 6, Governing Council did not approve the proposed formation until Nov. 22.

It was another month, said academic affairs chairman J.E. Dove, before sub-committee members were actually chosen from the academic affairs committee on an equal staff-student basis and the composition approved by Governing Council in December.

Gord Barnes, student member of the parity sub-committee, expressed concern that a meeting had not been called earlier as did Anderson.

The Forster report on tenure recommends students be excluded from staffing committee because the task force was unable to decide how students should be selected.

Attention all deviants:

The above social aberration is the sort of news hack that we love and revere around the Varsity, the winner of the 1897 lower Abyssinian Big Scoop Award for his coverage of the now-famous arm-wrestle that claimed the lives of 42 unsuspecting civilians. The CIA has denied any involvement. Notice the hard news addict glib in his eye (helped along by the liberal dosages of Stermo contained in the bottle.)

This is the sort of guy that forms the life of a paper, and you have your chance to meet him and all his friends as the Varsity opens its doors to the public for "Operation Candor." Yes, we confess, we have been hiding and obscuring our machinations and movements, but only in the interest of internal campus security, believe us, we're not crooks.

So, for a short time this Wednesday, you can be ushered into the sanctum sanctorum to witness all the intricacies of this business.

If you're interested in any of the many arts that go into this paper, writing, editing, graphics, photography, layout, sports, features or general fooling around, we have room here, more than enough.

We're so looking forward to this, the air of expectant excitement around the office has the staff scurrying around to the nearest St. Vincent de Paul Society Box for our new coming-out wardrobe, and our editor even took a bath before running off to his wine dealer to choose a light, impetuous little Chateau Old Sailor 1974 for the occasion. Yes, we'll be in our best bib and tuckery in wait for you.

The date: Wednesday, January 16, 1974, any time after noon. The place: 91 St. George St., on the second floor. Do come, consider this your printed invitation.

Varg reporter closes meeting

A Friday meeting of the Arts and Science all-faculty academic standards committee adjourned without transacting any business after a Varsity reporter refused to leave when the meeting voted to move in camera.

The committee agreed with new vice-provost Milton Israel who said: "If we can't meet the way we want we just can't meet."

A number of members expressed concern with the possibility the committee would be bowing to "coercion" if it continued.

Professor D.J. Conacher echoed another member's feeling that the reporter, Bob Bettson should be physically removed if he was so "cautiously indifferent to reason".

The committee is made up of the chairmen of all departments of the Faculty of Arts and Science or their appointees and deals with curriculum, grading examination and other policy matters.

The committee, which was first opened to the press last year, voted to move in camera to consider the case of an individual student. It is the highest court of academic appeal for students in the faculty structures.

Most decisions on individual cases are made by the all-faculty Committee on Standing which also meets in secret sessions.

Dean Bob Greene approached Bettson before the meeting and asked him to leave. When refused, Greene brought the matter to the meeting where a 45 minute discussion ensued on how the committee should proceed.

The fact the committee meets in camera and without student membership has long been a sore point with student members of the general Committee of Arts and Science.

The two committees are among the few policy committees left in the university without student membership. There are no official student members on hiring, firing, and tenure committees.

Green told the committee he considered it an "absurd" situation and again unsuccessfully asked Bettson to leave.

Victoria College principal Jack Robson said it was obvious there was no possibility of discussing the case in question with a reporter present.

Interdisciplinary studies chairman Marty Wall said there were three issues involved: the confidentiality question on policy matters, the confidentiality question where an individual wants an open meeting and when her or she does not want an open meeting.

The student concerned was indifferent to the question until Dean Greene hurriedly took her aside before the meeting. He said she indicated to him she wanted a closed meeting. She made no comment herself.

How Roots give your feet a good feeling, then send it up your spine.

To see the idea behind Roots, take a side view look at the shoe. Instead of a heel to lift you up and tilt you forward, you'll find a one piece base to plant you firmly in touch with Mother Earth. Roots, you see, work very much like roots. And if you take a side view look at the human foot, you'll see why they work as well as they do. Your heel is the lowest part of your foot, so in Roots it sits in the lowest part of your shoe.

Suddenly you stand straighter as additional muscles in the back of your legs and the small of your back spring to life to help hold you up and move you around. Now consider that recess in your sole called the arch. If you spend a good deal of time on your feet, unsupported arches can sag and may fall out of shape altogether. (This is why in those pre-crisis days a police man was known as a flatfoot.) To help prevent your arches from falling, Roots are contoured to support them. There's a smaller recess between the balls of your feet which Roots will take care of as well.

1052 Yonge Street
(Opposite Rounddale Subway Station)

Near the front, you'll notice the sole is curved like a rocker. In normal walking, your weight lands first on your heel, shifts along the outer side of your foot, then diagonally across to your big toe which springs you off on your next step. The rocker idea simply makes that transfer of weight a little easier, which makes each step a little less tiring.

All told, Roots bring a good, natural feeling to man's somewhat un-natural custom of treading hard floors and city sidewalks. Roots are designed and made in Canada, and at the heart of our production are two generations of cobblers (a father and three sons) who cling to the premise that good quality footwear must still be made largely by hand. The way we feel about making Roots has a lot to do with the way you'll feel wearing them.

City feet need Roots.

Moves made to form Jewish Studies union

By MARGARET ROBERTSON

At a meeting on Wednesday a group of interested students and professors held preliminary discussions on forming a Jewish Studies course union.

A tentative committee was created and it is hoped that a representative from each class will form the union.

This will have a function unique on the campus. Not only will it evaluate the curriculum, but it will also attempt to ensure the survival of the program by presenting a unified student front when the program comes up for review by the Governing Council next fall.

Jewish Studies student Tunde Neneth feels the student voice on the campus is already too strong to allow the university to disband the program.

But professor Emil Fackenheim, a philosophy teacher who addressed the meeting, said the Jewish Studies Programs have never really been accepted on campuses in North America or Europe and in this universities have failed to live up to their claim of "universality and enlightenment."

Many, he added, regard Jewish history and Judaism as an "anachronism" but this is "purely a Christian prejudice. Jewish history has gone on and perpetuated its own culture."

In 1970-71, as a result of student initiative, a Jewish Studies Program was established at the University of Toronto, to run initially for a trial period of six years.

Under an agreement arranged by professor Frank Talmage, chairman of the Program and the man mainly responsible for its development, for the first three years the program was to be funded jointly by the Jewish community and the university, and for the last three solely by the university, with an appraisal to be held at the end of that time.

However, because, as Talmage put it, "the time is now right," it has been decided to review the program two years earlier than originally planned and the matter will come before Governing Council next fall. Student interest is high and paradoxically, in some areas this is causing problems.

In spite of Talmage's efforts to gather as many relevant courses as possible into the Near Eastern Studies Department, courses are still being taught in other departments, but in some instances, as a result of the interest of Jewish Studies specialists, they no longer fit the moulds of the various departments.

Such a case is Anthropology 354. Originally, it was designed as an experiment in teaching a language, restricted to eight students. Almost at random, Yiddish was chosen as the language to be taught.

The 1973-74 enrolment for the course was more than 60 and it has become a "language" course. Now that it no longer fits their criteria, the Anthropology Department wishes to drop it.

Unfortunately this course, which is extremely important to the Jewish Studies Program, does not fit into any departmental slot, and nobody wishes to teach it. Overtures are being made to the modern language departments, but this course is in danger of disappearing.

Ideally, Fackenheim would like the Jewish Studies Program to become a separate department with strong interdisciplinary ties through cross-appointment.

Talmage agreed this would be the best solution, but said there is "hesitation on the part of the university."

Asked whether there is a great deal of anti-semitic feeling on the campus, he laughingly replied "that is nothing new," and added he did not feel this is the major reason for the "hesitation."

Jewish Studies currently employs five instructors. There would be six if Yiddish becomes part of the program and this number does not meet the minimum requirements set by the university for a separate department. The university feels that a small department would be "vulnerable."

Talmage expressed "hope for more autonomy," perhaps through college programs if the federated colleges become part of the University of Toronto system.

Jewish Studies Programs exist "quite amicably" he said, within other universities, but only where the department runs itself.

Part of the problem is that Jewish Studies is now interdepartmental, the first such program at University of Toronto, which means that "outsiders" are running the program and determining within their own departments what will be taught.

An added disadvantage is that this leaves the Jewish Studies specialist with "no identity."

A letter has been sent to the Association for Jewish Studies at Harvard University, in an attempt to discover how Jewish Studies Programs in other universities have solved their problems, and to determine all the options open to University of Toronto students.

A reply has not yet been received, but is eagerly awaited.

Evans stalls on Salaff meeting

By BARRY WEISLEDER

Dismissed part-time mathematics professor Stephen Salaff continues to be the object of a Simcoe Hall trademark—the great stall.

University president John Evans agreed in December to meet with Salaff to discuss his dismissal, but a failure to establish the conditions of the meeting has prevented progress in this area.

Evans has requested that Salaff submit in writing the basis of his grievance and present personally any further details pertaining to his case. However, before doing anything, Salaff was requesting clarification on three points.

According to a letter sent to supporting faculty, Salaff asks first: "What procedures and policy considerations lie beyond my submission of evidence to the president?"

Secondly: "(There's no indication that specific reasons for my dismissal would be sought, nor does it suggest that I would be given an opportunity to counter such statements."

Thirdly, he wants to know whether one possible outcome of this process is his re-instatement.

Evans has refused to offer any clarification along these lines. In a letter to SAC president Bob Anderson, dated December 3, he pointed out he will conduct "a review according to the normal procedures which are followed in cases of disputes about appointment policies."

There is, however, no such "normal procedure" in such cases, since in the past instructors not eligible for tenure have not been allowed a review of any decision to dismiss them.

Only an 11-day occupation of math department offices last year following the firing of Salaff, who is considered an excellent teacher by his students, and the denial of tenure for Michael Mather and David Spring, has made the treatment of this case somewhat different.

In correspondence with Evans, Anderson is on record as demanding an open hearing into the grievance, with an equal representation of students and faculty on any investigative/deliberative body in connection with this case.

The chief administrator has so far ignored this demand, as well as a petition in support of Salaff, which now has accumulated 117 faculty signatures, including Peter Russell, principal of Innis College, Irving Zeitlin, sociology department chairman, and full professors of math Chandler Davis and Edward Prugovecki.

The Forster task force on academic appointments, now being considered by the Governing Council's academic affairs committee, does not recommend any change in the current policy of no appeal for part-time teaching staff.

It does recommend some minor changes in appeal rights for a professor denied tenure, but essentially it would preserve the closed-door nature of the appeal.

Any student wondering what it's like to be a lab rat need only drive his/her trusty vehicle in the area bounded by Spadina, Bloor, Bathurst and Harbord. The maze of one-way signs is enough to make a lab rat flunk his finals. It's supposed to cut down traffic (and maybe while rats, too).

House repairs come slowly

By ANDREW FALUDY

Some progress has been made in carrying out repairs on a number of university owned houses on Sussex Avenue.

The houses were slated for repair in October of last year, when 180 repairs were ordered by city building inspectors on five of the houses.

It was estimated then that more than $250,000 was needed to bring the houses up to minimum city housing standards.

"The figure may well be closer to $300,000," claimed Michael Godkewitsch, a spokesman for the Huron Sussex ratepayers.

Godkewitsch emphasized some repairs had been carried out.

"Some minor things have been fixed, such as defective lights, windows and some fire-proofing has been done."

Godkewitsch noted the university seemed less concerned about the outside appearance of the houses. Among the list of housing violations not yet repaired by the university he listed "chimney-work, window-sills and renewal of backporches."

It was only after considerable pressure that the university carried out these repairs. According to Godkewitsch, nothing was done during the 90 day period the end of which the repairs were supposed to have been completed.

The 90 day period was specified by the city housing standards department inspector who visited the houses and ordered the repairs.

"Then the inspector was called in again. He was hopping mad," he said.

Godkewitsch added he felt the repairs had been done as "Gesture on the part of the university to placate the tenants."

The renovation of the houses was listed as a non-negotiable precondition for joining the Innis Co-op which is now being set up. The co-op wants to provide housing on a joint student-community basis.

Godkewitsch was pessimistic about the proposals at present under consideration for a lease for the project.

"It is likely that the tenants will not go along with the new lease," he said. "The pivotal point is the amount of control the university is willing to give us."

"If we don't have a guarantee of 10 years control then it is just not worth the effort of forming the corporation."

Wiretap bill shows Senate's irrelevancy

The Senate's decision Saturday to pass the so-called 'wiretap bill' (C-176) including a controversial amendment it had dropped last month from the House of Commons legislation, was consistent with the feelings of lower house members. However, the upper house should not have spent an additional month debating and obstructing legislation. The Senate's actions will only add new voices to the call for the permanent dismantling of an anachronistic governmental structure.

The Senate should pass any-and-all legislation sent it by the House and, in failing to do this with Bill (C-176 the first time around, it served in an obstructionist role.

Some form of legislation concerning electronic eavesdropping has been before Parliament three times without becoming law — further procrastination was unwarranted. The present bill was the subject of much debate in the past session of the House and was amended considerably by the combined opposition of Conservatives and New Democrats outvoting the minority Liberal government.

Bill C-176 was designed to outlaw private wiretapping and control electronic bugging by the police. However, its provisions are still somewhat inconsistent and leave some decisions open to future legislation.

Under the Protection of Privacy Act (actually a series of amendments to the Criminal Code) the Crown Liabilities Act and the Official Secrets Act the Crown is liable for damages of up to $5,000 for acting illegally in wiretapping. Officers of the Crown who place a wiretap without authorization also face prison terms. The new legislation will permit the police, once they get approval from a judge, to use wiretapping to investigate a wide spectrum of suspected crimes, ranging from sedition to air hijacking, bribery, and kidnapping, some narcotic offences and wiretap offences.

In general, the new law covers only indictable offences. Police would not be permitted to use bugging for petty crimes such as driving offences. However, they will be given broad powers to use electronic surveillance in probing organized crime, once they have convinced a judge their request for a wiretap is valid.

(However, even this legislation is open to wide interpretation. Metro police chief Harold Adamson, for example, defines 'organized crime' as 'where two people conspire to commit an indictable offence that is organized crime'.)

The Senate and the country would have been better off had it passed the legislation unhindered. The opposition parties had already managed to gain some 'civil liberties' by amending the bill, even if they did lose out in some cases.

For example, Conservative MP John Diefenbaker led the opposition in defeating one clause allowing police to bug for up to 36 hours without permission. He described the 36-hour clause as "the most dangerous provision that has ever been incorporated in the law of this country...this thing...is the essence of tyranny and capable of being used to destroy political opponents or others with whom the government is in disagreement." The minority Liberal government not only agreed to eliminate the '36-hour' clause, but also limited the number of offences for which wiretaps can be authorized.

In most cases the police would be required to receive authorization from a judge to wiretap after providing an affidavit with all particulars and to certify that other police methods had been tried and failed or were not likely to succeed. However, Justice Minister Otto Lang won his point on the right of police to use indirect evidence obtained from an illegal wiretap, providing the trial judge considers the evidence to be relevant. As he told reporters: "That was the big one I wanted to win."

The Varsity-Alton King

When the bill finally passed third reading in the Commons Lang, had failed by a five-vote margin (118-113) to have deleted from the bill a justice committee amendment requiring objects of a legal wiretap by police to be informed that they have been bugged 90 days after the bug has been removed if no prosecution has resulted from the tap. However a judge could allow a further delay in notification on the grounds that a continuing investigation would be hampered by the notice. The final part of this clause was added by the combined opposition parties over strong objection from Lang, provincial attorneys-general and police chiefs after close votes in the Commons and in committee.

It was this clause the Senate struck out thereby sending the bill back to the Commons. Lang's compromise, opposed by the NDP but supported by several influential Tory MPs, allowed the judge to decide if providing notice to the object of the police tap "is in the interests of justice and the protection of privacy."

Metro Toronto police chief Harold

Adamson played a key role in the Senate's decision to send the bill back to the House. Adamson testified December 13 before the Senate Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee on an unconvincing "law and order" platform. He came out in favor of the already-defeated 36-hour tap without notice clause, as well as the no notification after 90 days section claiming this would impede the solving of crime.

It's also important to note Adamson's position wasn't new to Metro police circles. Former Metro police chief James Mackey outlined in 1968 how Metro police had been using "electronic listening devices and telephone wiretaps" against suspected wrongdoers since 1966.

At that time Mackey told U of T law students the public interest would be better served if control of wiretapping was left with the chief of police and not given over by new laws to judges or magistrates. Mackey felt that "anyone who is going about his business and living within the law has nothing to fear because we are just not interested in him."

We disagree; police have to be watched by the public and press just as carefully as they watch "suspected wrongdoers." Adamson's "law-and-order" attitude appears to be commonplace in the thinking of Metro Toronto police executive bureaucracy. The same thinking had considerable impact in swaying the Senate, but it should not have. Adamson's opinions are no more representative of the public thinking than is the sentiment of the anachronistic Senate. (One of the two major reasons given the Senate for its rejection of the amendment was that "it could hurt continuing police investigation.")

The Senate has demonstrated once again — this time through its mishandling of the wiretap bill — that it is more than a minor anachronism. The Senate's membership is ridiculously unbalanced — 73 Liberals, 17 conservatives; two independents, one Independent-Liberal, one Socred, and eight vacancies. With the minority Liberals capturing only 39 per cent of the popular vote in the last federal election, how can the upper house claim to be at all representative when the Liberals hold 73 of the 102 Senate seats? This can't be permitted to continue.

Senator Carl Goldenberg, chairman of a Senate committee that originally amended the wiretapping legislation sent it by the Commons, says the Senate exercised a "suspensive veto." Such practices must be eliminated in the future. The government has two choices: amend the composition of the Senate so that it more adequately reflects the sentiment of the country, and not the boardrooms of corporations or pay-offs for past election help and dedication to the Government party, or remove the unwieldy Senate from the Constitution.

Since several government's had refused to act on the Senate and there is little hope for change we feel that it should be abolished. We're ready aye, ready.

Island article had two factual errors

The article re Toronto Island on January 9 contained two significant errors which cannot do anything but damage your reputation for accuracy further. The picture displayed of the island community in 1957 is not of Ward's Island (where the proposed par three golf course was to be located) but of Centre Island where the formal garden is now located. This can be verified from the fact that the Manitou bridge (background) still stands and you would have known this had you checked a source, for example, Michael Filey's 'Look at us Now' where this picture appears. Secondly, the golf course proposal is by no means a certainty. Current opinion at Metro now favors a speed-skating course or a boy scout camp.

None of these errors undercut your basic proposition re the residents nor the appalling privileges enjoyed by the yacht club.

Vic dons angry about grapes

We as dons in the men's residence at Victoria College wish to protest at the reactionary outlook of the men of the residence, as represented by the Residence Council, in condoning the serving of Californian grapes on Burwash Hall tables and note with displeasure the relish with which even some members of the VUSAC executive consume them.

The dietitians are to be commended for seeking to ascertain the wishes of the men in this matter. Even though some of the elected representatives failed to make a thorough survey, the resultant poll probably accurately reflects the feelings of the men (but not the dons). Of the eight houses, four voted that Californian grapes should continue to be served in the Dining Hall (Middle, South, Ryerson, Bowles-Gandier—the last named being the Emmanuel College house, essentially for aspirant United Church ministers); one house was insufficiently moved by the whole matter to register a response at all (Nelles); and only three supported a boycott (North, Gate, Caven). Can one be surprised at the Canadian Government's backing of right-wing causes (such as their recognition of the Chilean junta, their continued support of the Portuguese in Guinea-Bissau, etc.) when students, who in most other countries are in the forefront of progressive social movements, here fall even to support a cause that has received the backing of the United and Roman Catholic Churches and leading conservatives like Mayor Crombie?

Flash: U of T red to the core

Check your premises.

It seems to me as though our many student activists have their Marxist-Leninist lines crossed when they urge confrontation with faculty for student parity.

Here at U of T we have the best of the socialist philosophies actually in practice. We, the students, are a group of virtually powerless employees, completely subject to the whims and whimsies of our employers, the faculty and administration. The workers decide goals and even hiring and firing. Indeed they can exile any employer at any time according to the latest laws.

I cannot see how our socialist friends can suggest management should have power as they did in Bologna. Clearly this notion is the work of revisionists.

Jaffary tossing in the towel

By DICK BROWN

In a statement more resembling an election speech than tossing in the towel, Ward 7 alderman Karl Jaffary announced over the weekend he will not seek re-election at the end of the year.

In typical Jaffary style, he ignored the usual tradition of a press conference to make the announcement and wrote a column in the Ward Seven News, telling his constituents first of the decision.

Jaffary cited the frustration of city hall politics and the overburdening work load as reasons for bowing out after his current term expires in December of this year.

On the other hand, he is not leaving politics just yet, he said.

"I'm not making any secret of the fact that I would be interested in a challenging—and remunerative—job in 1975, and if I were offered a good one that meant resigning my seat on council before the end of the term, I would have to think about it," he said.

Jaffary himself writes off the possibility he might seek a candidacy for federal MP for the NDP, although he has been a federal Vice-president of the NDP.

However, speculation among local NDP observers centres on a possible move by Jaffary to unseat Stephen Lewis as provincial NDP leader.

It has been an open secret for months that Jaffary is no supporter of the directions in which Lewis has been leading the Ontario New Democrats.

He was one of the few elected NDP incumbents at any level of government who in 1972 publicly opposed Lewis' successful drive to purge the provincial party of its left-wing Waffle faction, although Jaffary has never been a Waffle member.

While Jaffary himself discounts a move to dump Lewis, he still left the door open to get into provincial politics:

"I am not interested in being a part of the opposition at Queen's Park," he wrote, in Ward 7 News, "I am not interested in strengthening the opposition, or trying to become leader of the opposition or having anything to do with orderly, democratic, parliamentary opposition."

"I am interested only in throwing that (provincial) government and all its works out of office."

"Unless I could see some way of trying to do that I would not be interested in provincial politics."

One of the key members of the so-called reform caucus in Toronto's city council, Jaffary has been called the most powerful elected city politician.

But his is the kind of power which wheels and deals behind closed doors rather than in the public arena.

When the dust and confetti settled from the December 1972 municipal elections Jaffary found himself a member of city council, city executive, Metro council and Metro executive, a work-load Jaffary admits is "four full-time jobs."

"I don't think anyone can do justice to four full-time jobs," Jaffary said of his responsibilities.

Yet on top of that he assumed the additional job of being a one-man task force to streamline city administration and bureaucracy.

Gathering confidential reports from a number of sources on waste and inefficiency in city hall, he has guided a massive bureaucratic reshuffling through council which has eliminated four city departments, and seven department heads and could save city taxpayers $1 million per year.

"I get a lot of my job satisfaction out of the administrative side of things," Jaffary says modestly.

But somewhere along the line it went sour for Jaffary. He complains of "endless hours spent wrangling over symbols and procedures" at council meetings.

Likewise, the small-c conservative opposition at city hall bothers him?

"I have spent all the time anyone needs to spend, in a lifetime, listening to nonsense from (Ward 6 Alderman) William Archer and (Ward 4 Alderman) George Ben."

Jaffary's rise to municipal power in the last municipal election followed his first term on council (1969-1972) as a progressive opposition spokesman working in tandem with Ward 7's other alderman, John Sewell.

The Ward 7 twins fought a three-year battle in and out of council to try and stop run-away development of the downtown core.

The Varsity—Doug Hamilton

Life at city hall proved too tough for Karl Jaffary, who may move on to greener pastures.

While losing almost every vote in council, they found their political views hit a responsive cord in the electorate, which swept in a new breed of council a year ago on a wave of anti-development sentiment.

That new council has barely lived up to its reform label, having split into three factions of almost equal power: reform, liberal, conservative.

Jaffary has spent much of his time trying to get the reform and liberal factions to vote together in a working majority, a not always successful

ful effort

While Jaffary represents the predominantly working class, east-end Ward 7, his roots are solid middle class.

His entry into politics came in the mid 1960s, where as a rising young criminal lawyer, he joined with fellow residents in the Don Vale neighbourhood to successfully oppose a city scheme of urban renewal there.

During his first term on council Jaffary set up a second law firm, and by his second term he had sold out his interest in his first law firm to buy another house in Ward 7.

Metro's new Brother controls the dole

For welfare recipients in Metro, 1984 is arriving 10 years early: their personal life histories are to go on secret file in a Metro computer which will belch out everything from common-law relationships to clothing needs.

The ghost of George Orwell's 'Big Brother' must be roaming through Metro as the section of the bureaucracy putting together the new system is called the Management Information Section of Metro chairman Paul Godfrey's office.

The computer system already handles the issuing of welfare cheques, pension data for all civic employees and road survey information.

For those on welfare it will keep track of the following:

- name of recipient and family members
- all addresses
- health of recipient and family members
- reports of previous work records
- notes on educational level
- marital status, including whether a single parent, divorced or widowed.
- a record of common-law relationships

• what sorts of social services being received in addition to routine cheques, such as home making and day care centres.

In return for storing the information, the computer will set out budgets for recipients based on the information in its memory banks.

The computer is to tell recipients how much they can spend on rent, food and clothing and write the welfare cheque for whatever sum the computer calculates as appropriate.

There is no indication if this computer is to be tied into the federal government's unemployment insurance computer in Belleville, Ont. but Metro officials say one reason the welfare computer is being brought into existence is to cut down on welfare fraud.

Senior Metro officials say the computer is designed to contain a complete case profile on each welfare recipient.

But the file in the computer is to be confidential, according to Metro social services commissioner John Anderson.

Even members of Metro council will not have access to all information, reserved for employees of the welfare department

The computer will also house files on any person receiving any sort of social assistance from Metro.

This will also include a new program being phased in by Metro to assist the working poor by providing drugs prescribed by a doctor, surgical supplies, moving allowances, dental and optical services, artificial limbs, vocational training, and funerals.

Once the new welfare scheme assisting the working poor is brought into effect, the total number of people on the Metro computer will number in the tens of thousands.

The rare woman who did make it into a "regular" medical school faced one sexist hurdle after another. First there was the continuous harassment - often low - of the male students. There were professors who wouldn't discuss anatomy with a lady present. There were textbooks like a well-known 1848 obstetrical text which stated,
"She (woman) has a head almost too small for intellect but just big enough for love."

In the late nineteenth century, the "women's health movement" began to dissociate itself from its Popular Health Movement past and to strive for respectability. Members of irregular sects were purged from the faculties of the women's medical colleges. Female medical leaders such as Elizabeth Blackwell joined male "regulars" in demanding an end to lay midwifery and a "complete medical education" for all who practised obstetrics. All this at a time when the "regulars" still had little or no "scientific" advantage over the sect doctors or lay healers.

Money and germs save the regulars

Though no longer faced with organized opposition (they could not claim to control any special body of knowledge), the professional victory of the "regulars" was only made tangible through a lucky coincidence. Science and ruling-class support became available about the same time, the turn of the century.

French and especially German scientists brought forth the germ theory of disease which provided, for the first time in human history, a rational basis for disease prevention and therapy.

Meanwhile the US was emerging as the industrial leader of the world. Fortunes were ruthlessly built. The Rockefeller and Carnegie foundations appeared in the first decade of the twentieth century. One of the earliest and highest items on their agenda was medical "reform", the creation of a respectable, scientific American medical profession.

Naturally the money to set up such institutions as John Hopkins was firmly behind the scientific elite, of the "regular" doctors, leaving the smaller poorer schools (often special schools for blacks and women) to close. Medicine was established once and for all as a branch of "higher" learning, accessible only through lengthy and expensive university training.

Medicine had become a white, male, middle - class occupation. The doctor had become "the man of science" - beyond criticism, beyond regulation, very nearly beyond competition.

Outlawing the midwives

All that was left was to drive out the last holdout of the old people's medicine - the midwives. In 1910, about 50 per cent of all babies were delivered by midwives - most were blacks or working class immigrants. Potential profits for "professional" obstetricians were going down the drain.

Publicly, however, the obstetricians launched their attacks on midwives in the name of science and reform. Midwives were ridiculed as "hopelessly dirty, ignorant and incompetent."
and reform. Midwives were ridiculed as "hopelessly dirty, ignorant and incompetent."

A truly public-spirited obstetrical profession mass of midwives. This is in fact what happened in England, Germany and most other European nations: midwifery was upgraded through training to become an established, independent occupation.

But the American obstetricians had no real commitment to improved obstetrical care. In fact, a study by Johns Hopkins professor in 1912 indicated that most American doctors were less competent than the midwives.

Under intense pressure from the medical profession, state after state passed laws outlawing midwifery and restricting the practice of obstetrics to doctors. For poor and working class women, this actually meant worse - or no - obstetrical care. For the new, male medical profession, the ban on midwives meant one less source of competition. Women had been routed from their last foothold as independent practitioners.

The Lady With the Lamp

The only remaining occupation for women in health was nursing. Nursing had not always existed as a paid occupation - it had to be invented.
Credit for the invention of nursing goes to a small handful of upper class women reformers whose prime interest was not in improving opportunities for women but in improving hospital conditions.
In the view of nursing leaders like Florence Nightingale, the filthy and archaic hospitals of the time needed a "woman's touch." The "Nightingale nurse," who set the pattern for nursing education in this country as well as England, was conceived as the embodiment of "femininity" as defined by Victorian society.

For all the glamorous "lady with the lamp" imagery, nursing at the time involved little more than household drudgery, with the patriarchal husband replaced by the lordly doctor. But just as the late nineteenth-century women's movement had not opposed the rise of medical professionalism, it did not challenge nursing as an oppressive female role.

Women have not been passive bystanders in the history of medicine. The present system was born in and shaped by the competition between male and female healers. The medical profession in particular is not just another institution which happens to discriminate against women: it is a fortress designed and erected to exclude us. This means to us that the sexism of the health system is not incidental, not just the reflection of the sexism of society in general or the sexism of individual doctors. It is historically older than the medical science itself; it is deep-rooted, institutional sexism.

Professionalism in medicine is nothing more than the institutionalization of a male upper class monopoly. We must never confuse professionalism with expertise. Expertise is something to work for and to share; professionalism is - by definition - elitist and exclusive, sexist, racist and classist.

Our oppression as women health workers today is inextricably linked to our oppression as women. Nursing, our predominate role in the health system, is simply a workplace extension of our roles as wife and mother. The nurse is socialized to believe that rebellion violates not only her "professionalism," but her very femininity. This means that the male medical elite has a very special stake in the maintenance of sexism in the society at large. Doctors are the bosses in an industry where the workers are primarily women. Sexism in the society at large insures that the female majority of the health work force are "good" workers - docile and passive. Take away sexism and you take away one of the mainstays of the health hierarchy.

What this means to us is that in the health system there is no way to separate worker organizing from feminist organizing. To reach out to women health workers is to reach out to them as women.

Workers urge boycott of new postal codes

By ART MOSES

The post office wants Canadians to start using the new six-digit postal codes, but its workers have other ideas.

The Canadian Union of Postal Workers, (CUPW), representing inside postal employees, wants people to boycott the new codes until post office officials shelve current plans which the union fears will lead to wage stagnation.

Meanwhile, the post office plans an intensive television advertising campaign in southern Ontario next month to prod people into using the codes on all mail. Officials refuse to say how successful their efforts have been in the Toronto area so far. Since Metro Toronto received its codes in Nov. 1972 householders have received two leaflets pushing the codes, besides being exposed to media ads.

The six-digit codes fit into the post office's multi-million dollar mechanization scheme allegedly designed to speed up mail service.

The post office has purchased $110 million in sorting equipment, much of it from International Telephone and Telegraph Corp. (ITT) and the new codes are necessary to operationalize it.

Besides equipment the post office is spending $109 million in Metro Toronto alone on massive new buildings to house the new machinery.

Under the new scheme, hundreds, perhaps thousands of postal workers will be declared "coders." They will sit at a keyboard and punch a signal onto every piece of mail they handle. The signal will be determined by the six-digit code which the post office hopes the sender will already have placed on the envelope.

After being assigned the computerized signal, the mail will be automatically sorted.

The union's chief complaint is that the coders will receive significantly less pay than people who now sort mail manually. The post office created a new lower-pay classification to accommodate the coders.

"It is true that management has made a written commitment that no postal worker will lose his job or be reclassified into a lower rate of pay," CUPW secretary-treasurer Art Harrison said in a recent interview.

"But if a worker was assigned a job where the normal rate was lower than his current rate, he would be frozen at his current rate until the rate for that classification had caught up. He could be deprived any raise in pay for five or six years.

"Although the commitment doesn't sound bad at first, you can see that it would be possible to be frozen at this same rate of pay for 10 years."

Harrison says the coders' job is every bit as demanding as the manual sorters. But when the post office introduced the mechanization scheme to the union during contract negotiations in July, 1972, the hourly rate for coders was set at $2.94, while the rate for manual sorters was $3.69.

Harrison expects almost every postal clerk to eventually be reclassified as a coder. At the old rates former manual sorters could not expect any raise until the coders rate exceeded $3.69.

The long-term implication for the postal workers' pocketbook is clear.

But post office information officer Jim Cowan did not know why the union is upset with the mechanization scheme.

"They are afraid that mechanized mail sorting will cut out jobs, but the commitment from the Postmaster General on down, which is as high as you can get, is that no full time postal employee will lose his job of his ranking."

Cowan, a former reporter for The Varsity, Toronto Telegram and Toronto Sun thought the union may be using the code boycott as a lever in the next round of contract negotiations beginning next October.

"But if anything working conditions will improve with mechanization. The new plants will be quieter, cleaner and have better rest areas," Cowan claimed.

Harrison wasn't impressed.

"With the new plants, the government will be trying to reclassify all of us. If the government gets away with the postal codes the way they're being planned, our wage position will deteriorate."

"The government doesn't care how much it spends on new buildings and new equipment, but it's stingy when it comes to paying its workers."

Harrison appeared disheartened when discussing the long-term prospects of Canadian postal workers.

The Toronto CUPW local wanted to fight mechanization when first introduced in July 1972 by shutting down the Ottawa post office, but was over-ruled by the CUPW national office.

Now the union's national office is dragging its feet on organizing the postal code boycott.

Several labor unions have never heard of the boycott.

"We have just started boycotting the postal codes," Ontario New Democratic Party Organizer Michael Lewis said Friday. "The NDP has close ties with most major labor union." But we told the CUPW that we had received no information until recently. Apparently the OFL and the Canadian Labor Congress aren't interested in pushing it."

Harrison said the CUPW national leadership is trying to negotiate a settlement with postal officials quietly, but the issue may become a factor in the next contract negotiations. Currently the codes are operational only in Ottawa. If mail is addressed to any other location, using the code now is a waste of ink.

Post office plans for overall implementation are somewhat vague. Cowan hedged when asked when the mechanization will be fully operational in Metro Toronto. New plants in Mississauga and south-east Toronto are still under construction.

"We're expecting to start some of their operations in October for large-volume mailers, he said. "We want people to use the new code so they'll get used to it by Jan. 1, 1975. We'll start testing equipment maybe in August and start using it six months later."

And after that, if people don't use the codes?

"Nothing will happen. Sorting will be done by hand and it might take a little longer, Cowan said. "It stands to reason that if there's no code and the letter is rejected for manual sorting, it'll take a little longer."

The question remains whether the postal codes are really designed to speed mail service to provide a long-term brake on labor costs.

Study shows four-day week liked by workers

While workers in a St. Louis study do not overwhelmingly approve a four-day work week, after a year-long tryout, they still favor the four-day week over the now-traditional five-day week.

The results came from a year-long study of 100 workers in a St. Louis, Mo., plant by Walter Nord and Robert Costigan of Washington University.

The researchers report after one year, employees "had consistently positive attitudes towards the four-day work week" and absenteeism, which four-day advocates claim to be a major improvement, decreased by 16 per cent.

The researchers warn the sample of 100 workers is a small one, and make the inevitable call for more research. However, some of their findings include:

After a year workers with low-paced jobs (janitors, maintenance personnel) tended to be somewhat less favorable than workers with high-paced jobs (assembly line); however, a majority of both groups favored the plan.

Workers who planned what they would do with their extra weekend time were somewhat more favorable towards the four-day work week than those who made no plans.

In addition, those who made task-oriented plans tended to be more favorable than those who made recreationally oriented plans.

Again, a majority in each group liked the four-day. Older workers tended to make task-oriented plans, while younger workers were recreationally oriented.

Workers who perceived the change as favorable to the company held more favorable attitudes towards the four-day than those who didn't.

Initially (after 13 weeks) the number of workers reporting the new system as having a favorable effect on their personal life was nearly twice those reporting unfavorable results (47 favorable, 24 unfavorable).

However, after one year the number reporting unfavorable results had risen to 34 while favorable results were reported by 20.

Most of those reporting some unfavorable results still favored the four-day work week however.

After one year on the four-day, workers reported they got an average of 6.82 hours of sleep a night as compared to 7.05 hours of sleep per night when they were on the five-day.

Females were generally more receptive to the four-day seeing it as having favorable effects on both their job and their home life. In addition, females consistently made more task oriented plans for weekends, while males made more recreationally oriented plans.

The researchers emphasized that most attitudes took a year to develop suggesting that the effects of the four-day develop over time.

At the end of a year, 81 per cent of the employees reported the four-day work week highly favorable and 19 per cent less favorable.

Exxon aids poor (unwillingly)

BUENOS AIRES (CUP) — The left-wing guerrillas of the People's Revolutionary Army arranged substantial aid for the poor and hungry of Argentina last week.

Esso Argentina agreed Friday to donate $10 million worth of food, clothing, tools, and medicine to the poor in return for kidnapped Esso executive Victor Samuelson.

The announcement of the agreement came in a communique sent to Buenos Aires newspapers.

Samuelson was kidnapped Dec. 6 when seven men carrying machine guns walked into a cafeteria at the Esso refinery at Campana, 50 miles north of Buenos Aires, and spirited him away while he was eating his lunch.

Esso Argentina is a subsidiary of Exxon Oil Company.

NEW YORK (CUP-LNS) — What fast-food chain uses enough energy annually to supply the cities of Pittsburgh, Boston, Washington and San Francisco with electric power for a whole year? If you thought of the ubiquitous arches of McDonald's you're right.

According to a University of Illinois computer scientist, Bruce Hannon, the packaging to McDonald's hamburgers, french fries, and other products consumes three billion kilowatt hours of electricity per year, or the energy equivalent of 12.7 million tons of coal.

In addition, McDonald's uses 174 million pounds of paper yearly, which is roughly the sustained yield of 315 square miles of forest: each McDonald's patron discards 2.4 ounces of packaging, including paper cups, bags, plastic lid covers, burger boxes, wax paper and straws.

McDonald's is the fourth largest food server in the U.S. trailing after the army, Kentucky Fried Chicken, and the Department of Agriculture.

"McDonald's is probably no worse than Burger Chef, Dairy Queen and all the others," says Hannon. "They are a symbol of nationwide waste of material and energy resources."

Don't think the McDonald Corporation isn't doing anything about this waste, however. In an attempt to help school children develop "environmental awareness," McDonald's is distributing its own "ecology pack" designed for fourth through sixth graders.

Peru takes over US-owned mine

PERU (CUP-IPRENSA LATINA) — "This is a day of victory for the Peruvian people and of the defeat of imperialism," said the Peruvian minister of power and mining, General Jorge Maldonado, at the official takeover of the US-owned Cerro Do Passo Mining Corporation.

The decision to place the company under state control was made last August when the Cerro management issued a declaration expressing unwillingness to negotiate a transfer to the Peruvian government. The government found the terms of the statement "insulting."

Unofficial sources in Lima said the company is asking $175 million in compensation.

However, the company owes approximately $60 million for housing for which it is legally responsible. The money was to go to building houses for the workers. In addition, the company may be expected to pay damages for pollution of air and water for more than 70 years.

Included in the corporation's claim for compensation is the value of ore not yet extracted which under Peruvian law belongs to the state. Without this the company's claim would be down to $12 million.

Peru's main source of wealth is mining.

U of T: Presidential factory

Aspiring corporate welfare bums, breathe easy.

U of T produces more presidents of corporations in Canada than any other university, according to a study by an American management consulting firm.

In fact, U of T outnumbers any other university by at least a two to one margin in producing presidents to be, the study by Heidrick and Struggles Inc. says.

The study was done last summer by surveying 136 corporation presidents who head firms in Canada with annual sales of $35 million or more.

About two-thirds of the firms are Canadian controlled—the study defined non-Canadian as a company with more than 50 per cent ownership held by a non-Canadian business organization.

Of 68 presidents reporting university degrees, 24 had graduated from U of T, the next highest totals being the University of Manitoba with 12 and McGill University with 10.

The only American universities mentioned in the study were Harvard with five and University of Michigan with four.

More than three-quarters of the presidents had a university degree of some sort and most were graduates in an engineering or science curriculum.

Just under a third of the presidents make at least $100,000 per year, and 88 per cent make $50,000 a year or more.

Before eager students rush over to the campus recruitment office, they better check their birth certificates, because 96 per cent of the presidents are 40-years-old or older, the median age being 52.

About 80 per cent of the Canadian-controlled companies are headed by Canadian-born persons while only 65 per cent of the non-Canadian controlled companies are headed by Canadian-born persons.

Most presidents have held their post for five years or less and 72 per cent of them have one or more directorships in another firm—36 per cent have three or more other directorships.

It's hardly a nine-to-five job running one of the big corporations with 78 per cent working 50 or more hours per week, and a third of those surveyed working 60 or more hours a week—about 12 hours a day, five days a week.

Heidrick and Struggles says over the last five years the greatest influence on corporation presidents "has been increasing involvement by all levels of government in business operations."

The firm says: "Corporate planning has become increasingly vital but at the same time more difficult with burgeoning governing activity."

The consultants indicate "more and more of the presidents' time has of necessity been devoted to first identifying and then adjusting to the effects of governmental regulations and legislation."

The firm predicts over the next five years the president of the Canadian firm "will have to be the mediator between government and the private business sector, adept at influencing legislation."

"No longer an authoritarian figure only, he will rank as diplomat who can provide an atmosphere conducive to development and stimulation of employees."

"With increasingly complex and larger firms, rapidly fluctuating markets both nationally and abroad, and heightened competition on a global scale, tomorrow's successful president will be the executive who is able to anticipate and plan in order to use change for his company's profit advantage."

Thumbs up...

...on Miami's great running back, Larry Csonka who spoke out against some of the worst aspects of American football.

"I think boys should be limited to flag football until they are older," said Csonka. "Football is a man's game and you need to be secure in your life before you accept all its problems."

"For boys, there should be less emphasis on winning and more on instruction and just playing the game for fun."

"People let children get into things without ever considering the negative side," said Csonka. "A lot of them can get soured at an early age and never come back because they are forced into a situation they are not ready for."

"I'm thinking about writing a book about the false character-building in football. About the violence, which kids don't really need. Do we need such an emphasis on winning?"

"I disagree that winning is everything," said the premier Miami fullback. "Didn't Lombardi say something like that? I don't buy it."

"The shunning of second best is what I disagree with," said Csonka. In this country you can never be second-best and hold your head up. Why should we put down the fellow who doesn't make it?"

Speaking of President Nixon's strong interest in football, Csonka said, "So President Nixon's a football freak. Doesn't that show a warped set of values?"

"Here he is, still the most powerful man in the world, with the influence to make a lot of lives better."

So where does he get off phoning football teams? We don't need him. He must be hung up on violence."

and thumbs down

...on NFL commissioner, Pete Rozelle, who effectively silenced Minnesota Viking coach Bud Grant's bitter criticism of the dressing quarters assigned to his team by the NFL.

While Miami practiced in the Houston pro football stadium, the Vikings were forced to use the shabby quarters of Delmar High School.

Grant said there wasn't a locker or even a hook in the room for his team to hang their clothes, and that "eight or nine coaches had to dress in an area no bigger than a table."

Grant also lead reporters to the shower rooms which had been assigned previously to a flock of sparrows. The tile floors, naturally, were covered with bird droppings.

Rozelle reacted instantly by threatening Grant with a $5,000 fine for "Statements detrimental to pro football."

Grant's general manager Jim Finks immediately deserted him at that point and Grant was left with little choice but to capitulate.

Then, with a lump in his throat, Rozelle told the media that disciplinary action of this sort was "the hardest part of my job."

The cross-country ski team competed in the Southern Ontario ski zone race over the weekend. It was designated as a class "A" men's race over a distance of 15 kilometers. Blues' captain Doug Garfield placed second in 44:55, 15 seconds behind the race winner. Dag Furst placed fourth in the race. Other Toronto skiers who also placed were Ken Sidney, Tom Best, Velli Ninimaa, Rich Sutcliffe, and Dave McClymont. Next race is this Friday at 11:00 am. It's the University of Toronto invitational and it's at Midland. In intercollegiate curling at Brock last Saturday, Toronto placed third behind York and Brock. There were 12 teams entered... Toronto slipped by Waterloo 6-5 in the first match and then trounced Trent 12-2. Unfortunately Toronto then lost 8-4 to York who went on to finish first. Members of this year's team are Ian Harper (skip), Paul Martial (vice), Art Lielkalus (second), and Bruce MacGillivray (lead). The next intercollegiate bonspiel will be Saturday at the Terrace Mutual at Gould. Play gets underway at 1 p.m. with finals beginning around 7:30. Admission is free...

Ravens scare Blues but lose

The ice Blues squeaked by a determined Carleton squad 3-2 in an uninspiring contest Friday night at Varsity arena. The match was reminiscent of Toronto's 4-0 drubbing of the Ravens in November at Ottawa.

However, this time, Carleton was able to capitalize on the sloppy and dispirited play of Toronto. The Ravens held a 2-1 lead until the eight minute mark of the third period when the league's top scorer Kent Runkhe scored his 15th and 16th goals of the season pacing Toronto to victory.

The first period was uneventful with both teams having trouble getting untracked. Play was concentrated between the blue lines and was very chippy. Varsity's roving forwards were stymied by Carleton's close checking and solid positional play. Brian Kett faced twelve shots in the Carleton net and Jim Campbell handled five.

Mike Berry opened the scoring in the second period for Carleton at 9:09. He beat Campbell cleanly with a quick shot from the slot set up by linemate Carmine Crocco to break a four-period scoring drought against the Blues.

Carleton kept plodding away and finally they got the Blues to engage in several rubeisms in the corners. Kett faced a flurry of good scoring opportunities successfully until Doug Herridge banged a rebound into an empty net after Kett had stopped a point-blank shot by Ron Harris. The penalty free second period ended 1-1, Toronto having a 10-4 advantage in shots on goal.

The Ravens, undaunted by the prospect of an all out assault by the Blues, threw a wrench in the works by scoring early in the third period. Crocco scored on a breakaway when Al Milnes was neatly checked by Mike Berry who sent Crocco in all alone on Campbell.

Runkhe spoiled the sixth place club's success when he scored the tying goal at the eight minute mark. Chuck Luksa dug the puck out of the Carleton corner and after a flurry of shots Don Pagnutti finally set up Runkhe in front of the net. He quickly fired over a sprawling Kett.

Toronto kept the pressure on and Runkhe connected for his second goal of the night assisted again by Pagnutti and Larry Hopkins at 11:18.

Carleton continued to keep the outcome of the game in doubt, coming close on several occasions.

Blues seemed content to protect their one goal margin and were unable to score when Kett left the nets in the last minute of play.

Varsity Blue Don Pagnutti seems to have Carleton goaltender Brian Kett beaten. He didn't, but later he assisted on two goals.

The win left Toronto entrenched solidly in the first place with a 9-0 record. Toronto's next game is at Varsity January 16 against R.M.C.

Swimmers cool Western heels

By DON WARNER

Varsity swimmers journeyed to London on Saturday to continue their long-time rivalry with the University of Western Ontario. Ever since the inauguration of the dual meet schedule some twenty years ago in the old OQAA conference, Western has been the Blues' toughest opponent.

Back in 1960, it was Western who took advantage of the declared ineligibility of a Varsity swimmer to win the OQAA championship. That was the only year since 1957 that Varsity did not finish first in the OQAA — OQAA championship meet.

On Saturday the Blues defeated their arch-rivals 71-42, notching their second straight win of the young season.

The two outstanding swimmers for Toronto were John Sebben and rookie diver Fin Temple. Sebben set a team record when he became the first Varsity swimmer ever to break the 2:20 second mark for the 200 yard breaststroke. His time of 2:19.9 was also a pool record.

Temple put on an impressive display to take both diving events over a tough opponent. Being from London himself, Temple returned to haunt the Western squad who had hoped he would continue his diving endeavours in that city. He is a most welcome addition to the Toronto team.

Mike Guinness once again coasted home first in two races, the 200 and 500 freestyle events although in relatively slow times for him.

Dave Chutter took the 1000 free followed very closely by Jay Steele. Rookies Greg Vanular and Bill Chisholm won the 200 back and 200 fly respectively in encouraging times.

Not to be outdone, Western, led by Blair Sheppard, Craig Gauld and Wes McConnell swam to victories in the 50 and 100 freestyle events and the 200 individual medley. They also took the 400 free relay.

Last Thursday, the freshmen Blues team aided by such stalwart reserves as Wickenden, Warner, Holburn, McTaggart and Daniel, crushed a hapless Ryerson team 68-23. McKinstry, Bisset (2), Aho (2), Bean, Hibberd, Warner and Goldberg splashed to victories in that one.

Fac hockey alters the course of history again

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Interfac hockey continued to wind its merry way through history last week. In a terrible showdown at high noon last Thursday, New 1 and UC 1 met on a lonely expanse of ice because the league wasn't big enough for both of them.

New finally out-duelled UC 5-4.

Big guns for New were Locke, Tessier, Hobs and Carew. Dying for UC with their boots on were Huhtanen, Brayford, and a mysterious player known only as "No. 9".

Shortly thereafter, New II filled UC II with lead. The passage of time (four days) seems to have worn away the exact record of which New players scored the eight goals. The diary of a contemporary of the time, a Miss K. Boyd, mentioned that a Gollieth had scored a goal, but the rest of the names are lost to history.

How lucky we are that we live in civilized times when team managers fill out all the names of the players instead of one or two, as seemed to be the custom back then. At least we know that Greenspan spun the shutout for New.

Meds A defeated Scar I 4-2. The results of an independent autopsy performed by Varsity Sports showed that the cause of the Scar loss were four doctors — Foster, Davies, Toman, and Haukioja — who inadvertently left four goals in the Scar net. Scoring for the deceased were Wentworth and Cornell ("ask not for whom the bell nells, it nells for Cor.")

Grad I smacked Dent A in the teeth 4-2. Hovey, Prucunier and Zulioni shared the goals for the graduates. Replying for Dents was Jarema and Tarasak. If their team now needs some help straightening out their molars, Varsity sports can recommend a good dentist.

Music trilled a song of joy over Mgt Studies 5-4. McGregor, Kenins, Spragy, and Stewart (2) contributed to the musical ride. Todd, Spinks, Doherty, and Tepperman diligently practiced scoresmanship for those suave management students.

Discipline talks "fruitless" if Caput remains

It would be "fruitless to conduct discussions about the discipline code" unless the Caput is abolished, said SAC president Bob Anderson in an interview last night.

Anderson was reacting to a report from an administration source which indicated Governing Council's executive committee had passed a motion yesterday behind closed doors that would have allowed the Caput to continue with an amended discipline code.

The Caput, the university's sole tribunal for all discipline, still meets in secret sessions. It has the power to hand down penalties ranging from a mild reprimand to expulsion. Decisions may be appealed but only to Governing Council.

The executive committee decided if compromise could be reached on most of the sections of the discipline code then the entire amended document could be implemented provided there was "substantial progress" toward agreement on undecided clauses.

However, the administration source indicated, if the executive committee motion ever became policy, any discipline matter not covered by an amended code would automatically be covered by the Caput.

Anderson said there can be no implementation of the code without student consensus. He said there should be no amendments to the code unless those affected—students—first agreed to them.

"The Caput must be abolished," he said, adding if there were any gaps the Caput must not be used to fill them.

Responding to the report of the executive committee's decision, student governor Howard Levitt said in a telephone interview: "It is clearly unacceptable and shows both a complete disregard and lack of respect for the student community to pass the discipline code when the students upon whom it is being imposed accept neither its spirit nor its text."

The code goes to Governing Council January 24 for a vote on whether it should be implemented.

That vote was postponed from the November meeting of Governing Council after a late move by the administration to head off a confrontation with students.

Almost unknown by some students because of its in camera meetings, the Caput has been the sole disciplinary body at U of T since 1906 and has remained alive since.

Its membership consists of the university president, the principal of University College, the heads of the federated universities and colleges, the deans of the faculties and the warden of Hart House.

As well as claiming jurisdiction over all student infractions of academic and physical discipline, the Caput has also stated the following:

"Where the appropriate body exercising disciplinary jurisdiction has found that a student of the university has engaged in conduct prejudicial to the interests of the university, the Caput may, in its discretion, suspend or expel such student from the academic privileges of the university"

Other Caput-defined offences include:

"The organising of a parade on the streets of the city or the taking part in such a parade without permission of the authorities."

"Rowdy and other forms of behavior, either on or off the campus of such an objectionable nature as to bring the university into public disrepute."

Just what sorts of actions fall into these guidelines is left to the Caput to decide—behind closed doors.

Colleges win concessions, Evans work paper scrapped

By BOB BETTSON

Trinity College Provost George Ignatieff revealed Monday U of T President John Evans has already made major concessions in his negotiations with the federated colleges.

The president's working paper, according to Ignatieff, will no longer form the basis for the negotiations which will follow.

Ignatieff was speaking to a meeting of the Trinity College council, the supreme body for academic decision-making at the college. The council decided to allow Ignatieff to continue in negotiations with the provision all changes will have to be approved by the college council.

There was a great deal of criticism at the meeting of what many felt was an ill advised drive toward centralization.

Speakers stressed all changes would have to meet the approval of all college governing bodies before implementation.

Ignatieff, Innis principal Peter Russell and Arts and Science Dean Bob Greene are the members of a new drafting committee which will be in charge of formulating results of the negotiations.

The meeting on Friday which marked the start of negotiations revealed the president was willing to give in on some points but not on others, said Ignatieff.

Many professors objected to the new university-wide departments in college subjects, replacing the existing combined departments.

Student member John Wilson was alarmed at the tone of the president's recommendations.

"We are like a sailor who has been given the choice of walking the plank or being thrown to the sharks."

Trinity vice-provost William Rogers said there was agreement on some principles but great division on the mechanisms.

Professor Allan Latta compared the plans to a transition to "dictatorship". He said the college would have to change to the Haist rules which lay down an authoritarian structure. He said the Trinity structures were democratic.

There is a motion before the council to be discussed at the next meeting which would put students on hiring, firing and tenure committees.

Trinity is not bound by the Haist rules which have been used by the university to keep students off staffing committees.

The opposition to the central departments was supported by English professor G. G. Faile who said it was important the colleges retain control over their own appointments and continue to be involved in teaching at all levels.

English professor Michael Sidnell was "upset" because of Evans' use of "abstract" language which he called "miseducation and mischief." Evans was criticized by some other academics for his perversion of the English language by the use of words such as "operative".

French professor B. T. Finch accused Evans of going in the face of all opinion in pursuing his policies for centralization.

Others hoped the question of what happened to the collegiate board proposals advanced by the colleges. Many were interested in pursuing the fight but agreed to wait until they were considering specific proposals.

McKeough suggests national oil marketing board

By MIKE EDWARDS

What is the best solution for the energy crisis?

Canada should have a national petroleum marketing board says Tory militant Darcy McKeough. He was addressing a debate sponsored by the Hart House Debating Committee last night.

Meanwhile the Chorus sang Hallelujah, the Bridge club bid four spades, the U of T Outing club checked out and Arbour Room fans drank the night away. Such was the hustle and bustle of Hart House.

The debate was probably the most boring event of the evening. Speakers steadfastly refused to look into the political depth of the topic "Should Canada's oil reserves be nationalized." Instead, the speakers talked of the fight between the federal and provincial governments.

Darcy McKeough is the Minister of Energy for the Province of Opportunity and will be attending a Ministers' conference on energy next week. He made it quite explicit that "the concept must be national."

He gave great praise to the BNA

Act stating that all eleven Canadian governments must agree to a national energy policy. "They are all partners in confederation."

Speaking in defense of the large oil corporations, McKeough blamed the Canadian public for not developing an energy policy through their elected government.

"Business is entitled to policy and legislation handed down by a parliament. When we have the policy—then the companies can meet the requirements." Up until now the Canadian oil companies have had to deal with a "bankrupt national energy policy."

McKeough denied having received funds from any oil companies but "I would rather take money from oil companies than from people who peddle ideas that are lousy." He was referring to a speaker from the Revolutionary Marxist Group who stated the government acted as a tool for capitalism.

The debate was lost by a vote of 49-30. Speakers for the "Nos" pointed out the speakers for the "Ayes" had not made a sufficient argument for nationalization but only spoke of the need for a speedy resolution of the crisis. They counterposed the "dismal guidance of Civil Servants" to the "entrepreneurial talent of private industry."

Stephen LeDrew, speaking against the resolution, pointed out that the government can regulate prices and can oversee foreign and domestic corporations. "The government and the corporations have a great sense of public opinion—the age of the robber barons is over."

The speakers for the resolution, the "Ayes", returned the debate to the realm of the battle between the federal and provincial governments. They affirmed that Canadian oil reserves are the question under debate.

Ontario energy czar McKeough got support on campus.

Those reserves are now owned by the provincial government and the only correct road was federal control "for the benefit of all Canadians, and the oil companies."

Darcy McKeough was well suited to jumping into the debate at this point. "I want to come down on both sides of the debate in the best political tradition. However, I am not evading the issue. I want to keep my options open. Nationalization if necessary but not necessarily nationalization."

And so it goes. McKeough's concept of the petroleum marketing board would regulate prices that are lower than world prices but would give reasonable royalty to the provinces and reasonable profits to the producers.

The Hart House Debating Committee is a student group which sponsors debates such as this one, informal debates such as "Resolved that Body Rub Parlours Should Be Nationalized," free dinners for the speakers and hangers-on, and debating tournaments among teams from various parts of the campus.

Discipline debate

There will be a public forum at Trinity College tonight on the Discipline question at 7:30. Speakers will include Fred Winter, Chairman of the Fine Art Department and member of the Faculty Reform Caucus, student governor Howard Levitt, and John Wilson, head of Arts at Trinity. New restaurant to serve "conventional food."

By MARINA STRAUSS

Students will have to wait at least two months to buy a meal at the former location of Meat and Potatoes restaurant at Huron and Whatford Streets.

What's more, the new restaurant to occupy the university-owned building, which has conspicuously been standing idle for almost a year, will serve "conventional" food, according to Randy Grimes of the business affairs department.

The group originally proposed the building, intending to establish a "healthy foods" restaurant at low prices and open 24 hours a day, is considering taking legal action against Grimes.

In October, Grimes awarded the contract to the new owners and notified the group, Karma 11, to move out of the building.

Grimes refused to give the Varsity information about the new owners, who signed the lease this month. "I don't think it would be fair," he maintained.

Grimes claimed the major factor in rejecting his first choice was the Karma 11 group "never proved their expertise to me." The owners he chose did have the expertise, he said.

Karma 11 spokesman Brendan Caron charged: "Grimes is trying to get across the idea we're unstable."

"But we've had experience. We own two other businesses—Karma 11 retailers, which imports people-power vehicles and electronic motorcycles, and Karma 11 Co-op, which purchases good foods at lower prices."

"We have a macrobiotic cook in our group, people with experience as kitchen-help, chefs, waiters and waitresses," Caron noted.

"Our waiter was the valet of the Greek ambassador to France," he added. One member, he said, was once a short-order cook at a Fran's Restaurant.

Grimes claimed when he asked the group of its previous experience "they couldn't mention the name of any restaurants."

In the meantime, Grimes has moved out all of Karma 11's equipment from the building without consulting the group. "We're storing it (the equipment)," he said, adding he hoped to collect the cost of the moving.

When interviewed, Caron was unaware the equipment had been removed. The university, however, had told the group to evacuate the building last November.

"We had bought rugs, panelling, wire, we invested a lot in the place before we were told to leave," Caron said.

Caron admitted: "We'd rather settle it out of courts. We don't want the bullshit, we want the restaurant."

His group was unable to get into the building from September to November because the university had changed the lock on the door, Caron claimed.

Grimes said the previous tenants paid the rent on the empty building until their lease expired in the end of October. The university collected no rent for the valuable building from November and December.

Although Grimes denied he turned down Karma 11 because of the 24-hour opening proposal, the group insists this played a role in the final decision.

"He (Grimes) claimed the 24-hour opening might upset area residents," Caron said. "But we checked with the Huron-Sussex Residents Association, and they were in favor of the restaurant."

Caron also contended Grimes rejected his group because "we had long hair and beards."

"We were interested in establishing a restaurant that could survive," Grimes maintained. There is "absolutely" a need for a restaurant in the area, he added.

Grimes also rejected a proposal of Ojibway Indian poet Duke Redbird to set up a restaurant serving native Indian foods.

"The native community would really like to have a restaurant," Redbird explained in an interview.

He was told in October his proposal was turned down because he lacked experience.

"I ran a very successful club here in town for three years," Redbird said, "and we served some food."

The (Huron St.) building is ideal, in a good location and has such a good reputation," Redbird affirmed.

He was going to call his proposed restaurant "From Huron In" after the Indian tribe

U of T investment portfolio shows a profit

Even with a 20 per cent drop in the Dow Jones averages on the stock market, U of T business affairs officials were laughing all the way to the bank as the university investment portfolio showed gains all the way around.

The market value of the Endowed Funds Investment Pool rose to $28.8 million as of October 31 compared to a value of $27.8 million on July 31 reflecting a net increase of 3.6 per cent, according to documents released by the business affairs department.

The pool consists of about two-thirds bonds, almost a third stock shares and less than two per cent mortgages. The mortgage money outstanding is about $200,000. U of T has a mortgage plan for faculty members.

With a keen eye to interest rates some of the money is being shifted to bonds with shorter maturity dates "providing an important hedge against a decline in interest rates and any decline in long term bond prices."

The total return during the three-month period was five per cent when the market value increase and interest was combined.

Those money-bags reading the business pages of the Globe did fairly well with the Connaught Fund, a $13 million holding which showed a 5.6 per cent increase in September compared to July.

With a whirl of wheeling and dealing, $2 million of the fund was transferred from short-term notes and cash to bonds and debentures.

The $2.3 million bond and debenture holdings in the fund consists now of $1.5 million in corporate and $800,000 in provincial holdings.

The $9.9 million holdings in stock break down into $1.4 million in industrial mines, $1 million in bank shares, $790,000 in paper and forest products, $590,000 in miscellaneous industrials and $500,000 in western oils as the major holdings.

Those financial wizards at Simcoe Hall do not seem to have a taste for short term notes and cash as investments, for another part of the Connaught Fund, worth about $12.9 million, got the same treatment.

From July to September about $2 million was taken out of notes and cash and poured into equities and bonds, although about 80 per cent of the money is still in notes and cash.

Combining the interest dividends and increase in market value, that part of the fund had a total return of 2.64 per cent for the three-month period.

The stock market apparently is Simcoe Hall's strong point as that part of the portfolio brought a return of 7.5 per cent on a market value of about $1.5 million compared to the 1.4 per cent return on the remaining $11.4 million

Tread on PhD, thou art no longer useless

By BOB BETTSON

PhDs are worth more than they used to be according to a study released by the Ontario Government this week. In fact there may be a shortage of PhDs in Canada within five years.

From the dark days of Marjaleena Repo's report in 1969, called Who Needs the PhD, we have reached a stage where in 1972-73 only 64 people with PhDs out of 1,739 did not have jobs.

The report, compiled by M.A. Preston of the Council of Ontario Universities, reveals there is a real possibility of a shortage of graduate students to fill available places within the next five years.

"Graduate school enrolments have not grown appreciably for three years," the report notes in predicting the shortage.

Part of the reason for the predicted shortage is undoubtedly the high level of unemployment among PhDs predicted five years ago as well as parallel decreases in funding for graduate students.

The unemployment rate for new PhDs is less than four per cent, according to the study. This is less than the general unemployment level and comes at a time when employment in most fields is becoming harder to get.

The kinds of jobs new PhDs get were also explored by the committee. Only 35 per cent are gaining first employment in universities as opposed to 49 per cent in 1969.

Industrial employment was up to 10 per cent and most students from foreign countries stayed in Canada for their employment.

There is very little unemployment in the social sciences with a minimal amount in humanities. The situation also improved for science graduates, especially in industrial hiring.

No longer are chemistry PhDs working in bakery shops as was reported in 1969. Graduate taxi drivers are also notably absent.

Twenty-six per cent are now undertaking research fellowships, ten per cent with government and six per cent for private research institutes.

Though there is a reduced demand for new university teaching posts because of cutbacks in education these other fields appear to be taking up the slack.

But against a rise in government expenditure the new demand for PhDs seems unlikely to be met with an increase in the size of graduate programs at Ontario universities.

The recent cutback in graduate assistance announced by the province promotes a policy of awarding aid on merit rather than need, rejecting the policy of universal accessibility announced last year by the Commission on Post Secondary Education in Ontario

U of T is still behind on Sussex repairs

By DICK BROWN

The uncompleted repairs on five university-owned houses on Sussex Avenue date back to at least July 31, when the city housing standards department issued a work order demanding the repairs be completed by October 1.

By October 1, no repairs had been done, but residents now report "some minor things have been fixed."

However, major repairs are not done, and in the work order issued to the university the city claims the power to prosecute the university in court, fix the houses at university expense or order the buildings torn down.

The city has been in a legal position to exercise any one of these options since October 1, but to date has not moved against the university.

The five houses, 16-24 Sussex Ave., are supposed to be renovated and turned over to Innis College where they are to form the core of the co-operative student-community housing complex in Innis.

The houses are owned by U of T and administered for the university by Crown Trust.

Two U of T Governing Council members hold high positions at Crown Trust. W.J.D. Lewis is a director of Crown Trust and chairman of U of T's planning and resources committee.

James Joyce is a vice-president of Crown Trust and is also chairman of U of T's business affairs committee, the same committee which must approve any appropriation to repair university-owned properties.

The completed repairs include such things as defective lights, windows and some fireproofing, according to one resident.

However more major items such as chimney-work, window-sills and backporches are not yet repaired.

Copies of the work-orders issued by the city were obtained by the Varsity, and the 18 pages of violations list a pattern of poor conditions.

Some of the violations include:

- 16 Sussex Ave.:
 - Cellar flooring decayed,
 - Kitchen ceiling not covered with fire-retarding material,
 - Cellar toilet not properly enclosed,
 - Not enough electrical outlets in three bedrooms,
 - Deteriorating chimney and

- exterior brickwork,
- Lack of fire-retarding material in a bedroom ceiling,
- Ceiling plaster broken in another bedroom,
- Eavestrough and downpipe missing on the back porch.

- 18 Sussex Ave.:
 - Exterior brickwork deteriorating,
 - Entrance areaway unprotected creating a hazardous condition,
 - Eavestrough and downpipe missing on a porch,
 - Broken ceiling plaster in kitchen and living room

- Not enough electrical outlets in three bedrooms,
- Wall plaster broken.

- 20 Sussex Ave.:
 - Exterior brickwork deteriorating,
 - Eavestrough and downpipe missing on a porch,
 - Entrance steps decayed,
 - Defective electrical wiring,
 - Insufficient water pressure in the house,
 - Flooring in cellar bathroom decayed,
 - Flooring in first floor decayed,
 - Inadequate number of electrical outlets in bedrooms

- Some wall and ceiling plaster defective,
- Entrance walkway broken
- 22 Sussex Ave.:
 - Eavestrough and downpipe on porch missing,
 - Entrance walkway broken,
 - Entrance areaway unprotected creating a hazardous condition,
 - Cellar foundation wall deteriorated,
 - Concrete cellar floor broken,
 - Inadequate number of electrical outlets throughout the house,
 - Kitchen floor covering deteriorated,
 - Washroom floor deteriorated.

- 24 Sussex Ave.:
 - Exterior wood and metalwork not covered with a protective preservative,
 - Exterior brickwork and foundation deteriorated,
 - Broken backyard fence,
 - Eavestrough and downpipe missing from porch,

Vic's Regents join the developers

Victoria University is blundering into the development business again according to recent reports emanating from Victoria University Students' Ad-composed of two students, two The most recent Vic horror show involves Project Planning Associates Ltd., a firm hired to "set out all the alternatives for development of the area and assess their relative merits," according to Vic president G.S. French.

The $23,000 study will probably be completed within two to three months French indicated, with little time for student discussion of its details before the academic year ends and students leave the campus. We suspect that the planning cycle at Vic, as elsewhere at U of T, is co-ordinated so that students cannot have the same effect if the report could be debated during the academic year.

The world-wide development consultant firm is studying land use possibilities for the area bounded by Sultan, St. Thomas, and Charles Streets. Already planners have been unable to agree with students whom to consult to determine the feelings of concerned groups and individuals on the developments. As VUSAC president Brian Gazeley said last week: "We've been screwed once."

The committee which chose the consultant firm, was, true to Vic tradition, selected from behind closed doors. The committee included only administrators, faculty, and Vic Board of Regents representatives with no student residents or community people involved in the decision-making process. However, another committee composed of two students, two faculty, two board of regents and two administrators is to be formed to work with the consultants.

However, perhaps the Vic administration has learned from its mistakes during the last two years. It's now attempting to reach a "consensus" on the type of development (for the college is indefinitely committed to the development scheme) by interviewing separately area residents, students, faculty, administrators and other groups around Vic. VUSAC justifiably terms this policy: "divide and conquer".

The recent moves at Vic reminded us of an article by former Vic education commissioner Rick Gregory in the Vic students' paper, The Strand, last September. Gregory wrote: "The real purpose of this consulting work is not to discover an alternative to the Manulife project... but to legitimate the present thrust of development. This was to be accomplished by having an 'independent' firm show that the other alternatives are incapable of generating sufficient income, thus justifying the development on financial criteria, without regard to the negative effects on the community".

The present study is little more than an offshoot of the Manulife-Vic project whereby the college and Manufacturers' Life were to be partners in development, with Vic taking approximately 20 per cent of the profit for the land to be used for the building. Criticism by students, some faculty members and the public helped kill the proposed Vic-Manulife project last summer while most students were off campus. Gregory probably reflected much of the thinking of that time when he wrote in September, "Open planning was more an exercise in manipulative public relations which attempted by concealment and 'smooth talking' to ease public concern over the project, than it was an attempt to deal in an honest and open fashion with the community..."

"In any event there was always greater concern with the appearance of public participation, than with its substance."

"In the final analysis, Vic seemed perfectly willing to ignore the objections of the community and erect any building which would generate sufficient revenue."

Another important point Gregory brings out is the contradiction between academic development and the present day term of development (that is, construction). Gregory felt there was considerable evidence to support an interpretation of 'academic development'.

For example two houses on St. Thomas Street were expropriated by U of T at Vic's request and later sold to Vic for $1. Gregory also claims U of T president John Evans told him U of T had expropriated the land on the understanding it would be used for academic purposes. Evans also indicated U of T's lawyers were looking into the matter.

Expropriation undercut Mr. Minden, owner of the Windsor Arms Hotel, who also sought to develop the land. Gregory reported last September that "because of Vic's attempt to develop the land commercially, Minden was (is) seeking damages from Vic of some $200,000."

As Gregory points out, Manulife was approached by Vic through Henry Sissons, chairman of the Vic Board of Regents' property and finance committee. Sissons was criticized by students on the steering committee (including Gregory) for "avoiding competitive bidding." According to Gregory, Sissons' response was that the Manulife deal was the best Vic could get from anyone, and that Vic could have confidence in Manulife and could therefore dispense with competitive bidding.

Vic's experiences with development go back farther than the past year. The university (college) experienced considerable opposition in the 1971-72 academic year over its unilateral decision to allow a private carhop company, Allied Parking, onto the Vic playing field, thereby affecting both students and faculty.

Vic had already two parking lots under operation but decided to add another and have a private firm take over the handling of the parking facilities. The unilateral action raised yearly parking fees for students from $20 to $80 and for faculty members from $0 to $80.

The parking company was given the plunder of Vic territory for two years beginning in September 1971; but it didn't last past March 1, 1972. Vic's rake-off on the deal was $1,750 per month plus 60 per cent of gross parking revenues in excess of $4,000 per month. The VUSAC president Murray Davidson said "VUSAC had never been informed of the original contract with Allied." Vic readily admitted there had been no student consultation—in fact, tenders weren't even called for the contract. As Vic burser F.C. Stokes said at the time: "Allied Parking came to Vic as a highly recommended firm", and called the student criticism of the administration "pretty high-handed."

Mine owners nite: you have nothing to lose but the social order.

Prior to that deal Vic had brought in Gordon S. Adamson and Associates in March, 1970, to undertake a land use study. Its purpose was to "recommend the highest and best development of lands east of the university." Coincidentally (?) a report from John Walker of Parking Design and Development Ltd. was included. Walker was also director of Allied Parking. Vic has appears to have its own "one little happy family."

The planning study eventually recommended four options including high-rise apartments and townhouses in the Charles-St. Thomas block, and a proposal for a low-rise parking building beside Burwash Men's residence. Fortunately student, faculty and community opposition was also able to put a damper on this project.

Vic will probably be undergoing new negotiations soon over the Lillian Massey Building at the corner of Avenue Road and Bloor St.

The building will have to be sold. According to a legal report prepared for the now-defunct Faculty of Food Sciences by Thomson, Rogers, Vic is now entitled to $100,000 from U of T under the terms of the Lillian Massey Trust. Vic will should U of T purchase the land. (Vic also has the option of taking the land and the buildings, after paying for the present value of the land and the building improvements made by U of T.)

Then there's the other white elephant deal the Vic forefathers negotiated over the Colonnade property—$150,000 yearly for rental, a steal at today's land prices. (The Vic-Colonnade deal is on a long term lease at what is now considered to be a low rent.)

Of course the whole development issue has to be taken in the context of Vic's financial squeeze, (rumoured to be as high as $2 million in the red) and its attempt to stay solvent and independent. However, we wonder whether the fair college might do itself more harm than good by getting into the development game (as it did with the Colonnade and parking deals)?

Development at Vic appears to stem from a kind of assumed idea that the present institutional order at Vic must be preserved. As Gregory pointed out in his article: "If the status-quo is to be preserved, then development must be an integral part of the re-financing of the college."

We question Vic's apparently self-serving commitment. Unfortunately for the parochial administrators running Vic the world has changed and, as the U of T as a whole has found out in recent years, the university must be responsive to the community.

At this point in time development for development's sake is frowned upon throughout Toronto. We don't feel that Vic's administrators have searched hard enough for ways to preserve the college without resorting to development.

Development was the easiest road out of financial difficulty. We find it hard to believe it's the only way and for this reason we say 'thumbs down' on any further development at the federated university. Students should be prepared once again to organize against development at Vic. Watch out for committee rooms.

Canadians must support Chileans

It is now five months since the military seized power in Chile. Across Canada following the coup there was immediate response in solidarity with the Chilean workers and peasants. This activity has largely abated but not because of any change in the situation in Chile. The daily media now is largely silent on Chilean events and consciousness has declined as a result.

Despite the blackout in the capitalist media (with the exception of the recent "goodwill mission" of the Canadian government), the Chilean resistance demands our active solidarity with its struggle against the brutal thrust of the junta. The question has not been faced in most parts of Canada as to how best to build an effective movement to play a role in actually changing the balance of international forces in favour of the Chilean resistance.

Some in Canada have become distracted from continuing activity as a result of the token gestures carried off by the Trudeau government in allowing a small number of refugees into the country. That action by the government can, to some degree, be counted as a victory of the early actions around the refugee question by various committees in Canada. It is not an end nor does it address itself to the many thousands who still face imprisonment, torture, and death at the hands of one of the most brutal regimes in the history of Latin America.

The refugee question was the central focus of most early actions around Chile solidarity and correctly so. The role of the Canadian government in its support for the junta and the role its diplomats played in excluding exiles from the Santiago embassy were too obvious for the daily press to ignore. Even with the admission of small numbers of refugees into Canada, the government has followed a course which shows that it is more interested in excluding revolutionaries (witness the extended security checks) than in the plight of the political refugees.

The government's policy of delaying tactics made the situation in Canada even worse. The Trudeau cabinet obviously wished to see the issue quieted and more conducive to its token gestures. Members of Chile Solidarity Committees across the country occupied immigration offices to force the issue into public view. Fourteen were arrested here in Toronto and are scheduled for trial on January 23. One of the means to raise the issues of Canadian government policy on Chile and the continuing repression of the workers and peasants in Chile is to organize a political defence of the militants arrested in the immigration office occupations.

The issue of repression in Chile stands as the central focus for Chile solidarity in the immediate period. The lives of many leftists and foreign exiles in particular stand in jeopardy. Arbitrary arrest and summary execution continues daily in Chile. The junta has even pushed aside normal diplomatic relations as it proceeds with its butchery. The Swedish ambassador who gave aid to those in need of refuge was declared persona non grata and was himself physically assaulted by government troops.

A list of 48 most wanted people has been circulated by the junta. This "death list" includes many of the most outstanding leaders of the workers' organizations and radical intellectuals. Some have already been arrested, held in concentration camps, and subjected to periodic torture. We have raised two of the vic-times as symbols of the brutality: Luis Corvalan, leader of the Chilean Communist Party and Luis Vitale, leading Marxist intellectual and an outstanding member of the Fourth International. Activities that point out certain figures as exceptional symbols of repression can, when linked to a broader agitation around the issue of political prisoners in general, actually alter the relationship of forces. The international movements built to free Hugo Blanco of Peru and Regis Debray in Bolivia not only acted to save the lives of these comrades but forced so much international attention on the repression in those countries that a large number of revolutionaries were saved from death. The range of activity around the repression in Chile can include public rallies and demonstrations, offers of asylum and jobs, etc. Such activity can to a limited but important extent force the junta to retreat from its present level of wholesale repression. The activity of groups in solidarity with the Chilean resistance and in defence of the political prisoners must be aimed at reducing the capacity of the Chilean junta to regularize its activities both in Chile and internationally. Here we must include in consideration selective boycotts such as that raised by the Vancouver Chile Solidarity Committee and Ms. Allen for a boycott by longshoremen of Chilean ships. In other parts of the country, it may be more effective to raise the possibility of boycotts of Chilean wines, clothes manufactured in Chile for Canadian markets, etc.

All of these objectives to aid the resistance in Chile must be situated in the actual context of the present events in Chile. The junta is being forced to take extreme measures in its drive to crush any emergence of mass opposition. It has systematically attempted to break up workers' and peasants' organizations. The junta has shown that it has no delusion about "restoring basic democracy" nor is it afforded the manoeuvring room to do so. While we strongly criticize the failure of the Unidad Popular political strategy (the peaceful road to socialism) and the failure to prepare and arm the masses for the bourgeois counteroffensive, we recognize that the advanced elements of the working class and vanguard organizations were able to win gains which were important in the development of strong class consciousness. The organization of the industrial cordons is but one example. The junta aims to liquidate this experience from the consciousness of the Chilean workers and peasants. To do so, it must not only smash the organizations of the mass movements but carry off measures which defeat and demoralize the workers and peasants.

We join with our co-thinkers in the Fourth International in calling for continuing international solidarity with the Chilean resistance, both on the level of material aid and on the level of political action.

In Quebec, a day of solidarity with the resistance is being organized in early February on the six month anniversary of the coup. We feel this represents an important development which should have its reflection in English North America. The RMG is willing to cooperate with all interested groups and individuals in building such a day in Toronto. United action is the best means for the left to raise the struggle in Chile as an issue of real solidarity.

Support to the resistance cannot merely remain at the level of abstract internationalism. It is critical to stimulate political consciousness on the lessons of Chile and equally important to act to effect the relationship of forces in Chile through our campaigns in Canada. We invite other organizations and militants to begin the discussion with us on what basic such campaigns can proceed!

Hasta la Victoria Siempre!
Solidarity with the Chilean Resistance!

Vitamin C: The Healing Factor?

Reprinted from the Chevron
By BILL BROWN

One of the many dubious gifts which this century of progress has brought us has been the necessity to concentrate on fields of scientific inquiry ignored in previous eras. The progressive ruination of our environment, for example, has impelled the allocation of vast (and so far insufficient) human and financial resources to the infant science of ecology. An unchecked population growth has forced new approaches to agriculture and the development of birth control measures capable of implementation on a mass basis.

Similarly, the injection of various poisons into our foodstuffs, and the generally abominable dietary predilections of industrial man have brought new attention to the once predominantly theoretical science of nutrition. And, while the intensified focus on all these areas has brought with it a concomitant burden of pseudo-science and faddism, it is probably in the latter field that ungrounded expertise and popular misinformation have found their most fertile soil.

On that basis, then, it is not surprising that the reaction of the medical establishment to Vitamin C and the Common Cold, though written by such a scientific luminary as Nobel prize winning biochemist Linus Pauling, ranged from snide contempt to outright hostility. This reaction was understandable, and even predictable, not only because of the aura of mythology which engulfs the field of nutrition, but because of the many vested interests which it challenges.

Pauling's thesis was that the common cold, together with an indefinitely long list of other infectious diseases, is susceptible to prevention, and sometimes cure, by the intake of sufficient quantities of ascorbic acid. An obvious corollary to this thesis is that most other research into the control of these diseases is redundant, since the solution already exists. Furthermore, were vitamin C a regular component of our diet at adequate dosage levels, and did it live up to the claims of its proponents, the consequences for drug manufacturers would be disastrous, since many of their more profitable, but less effective nostrums would be unable to compete either medically or economically with ascorbic acid.

In 1972 another researcher, Dr. Irwin Stone, authored a book called "The Healing Factor: Vitamin C Against Disease" (Grosset and Dunlap) which documents and expands Pauling's claims. It was in fact a letter from Stone which had earlier prompted Pauling to write his controversial exploration two years previously.

Stone's book was detailed and fairly technical, and failed, despite its topical content, to elicit much response. He explained that the vast majority of animals are able to produce their own supply of ascorbic acid, and the primates' inability to do so results Klenner in 1948; and Dalton in 1962, reported their successful experiences with virus pneumonia treated with ascorbic acid in 42 cases and 3 cases, respectively. Paez de la Torre, in 1945, found good results in measles in children. Klenner, in 1949, successfully used ascorbic acid as a prophylactic in a measles epidemic and gave a dramatic case history in his 1953 paper in the treatment of a ten-month-old baby with measles. Zureick, in 1950, treated 71 cases of chicken pox with ascorbic acid. Klenner also cites the dramatic results he obtained in virus encephalitis and also in 33 cases of mumps and many cases of influenza.

from an unfavourable mutation at some common point in our ancestries, when our fruit-eating forebears discarded one of the genes necessary to the enzyme process which in most species produces vitamin C.

The most well-known consequence of this evolutionary accident is the fact of Man's susceptibility to scurvy, which, if unchecked, is the fatal result of a diet almost totally lacking in ascorbic acid. It is Stone's contention, however, that scurvy is symptomatic of only the severest vitamin C deficiency, and that almost everyone is operating at ascorbic acid levels far below optimum, with significantly negative results. For instance:

One of the most important biochemical functions of ascorbic acid in the body's chemistry is the synthesis, formation, and maintenance of a protein-like substance called collagen. Collagen is the ground substance or cement that supports and holds the tissues and organs together. It is the substance in the bones that provides the toughness and flexibility and prevents brittleness. Without it the body would just disintegrate or dissolve away. It comprises about one-third of the body's total weight of protein and is the most extensive tissue system. It is the substance that strengthens the arteries and veins, supports the muscles, toughens the ligaments and bones, supplies the scar tissue for healing wounds and keeps the youthful pact, the weakened structure and hemorrhage muscle weakness, that are painful to move, fall out, and the wounds never heal. Suboptimal ascorbic acid over during the early and its effect of producing collagen, may be the cause that causes the arthritis and joint hips, the heart and that cause sudden strokes that bring on aging process.

Stone goes on to include a long list of properties attributable to Vitamin C as an agent for many enzymes in the body's use of proteins and carbohydrates; as an agent in the chemistry and the function of the immune system. He terms it a "counteracting" agent, capable of counteracting the effects of many poisons (drugs, animal toxins), such as mercury, cury, arsenic). In addition, ascorbic acid with the peroxide monoxide, sulfur dioxide, and nitrogen oxides, making it a protection we have against pollution and smoke.

In 1957, Kirchmair used ascorbic acid daily for five days to treat hepatitis and found a weight gain and good results in 10 days, rapid disappearance of the hospitalization time. In 1958, Kirchmair found that 10 grams a day of ascorbic acid, obtained from KKirchmair's, Dalton, in 1962, found dramatic and rapid results in hepatitis.

It is even "a good non-toxic diuretic".

Panaceas are notoriously hard to find these days, and no less difficult to believe in, but Stone's enthusiasm for his knows no apparent bounds. He continues his list of marvels with the following assurances:

At relatively low levels (ascorbic acid) will inhibit the growth of bacteria and at slightly higher amounts it will kill them. The bacteria causing tuberculosis is particularly sensitive to the lethal action of ascorbic acid.

The number of bacteria that each white blood cell can digest is directly related to the ascorbic acid content of the blood. It is also a potent and non-specific virucide. It has the power to inactivate and destroy the infectivity of a wide variety of disease-producing viruses including herpes, poliomyelitis, vaccinia, foot-and-mouth diseases and rabies. It only does this, however, at relatively high doses.

Stone gives more than one hundred pages of descriptions of treatments using vitamin C, for a range of diseases and disorders which expands yet further the list enumerated above. The experimenters he cites report success with ascorbic acid in treating the common cold, hepatitis, virus pneumonia, measles, chicken pox, virus encephalitis, mumps, influenza, rabies, mononucleosis, tuberculosis, rheumatism, lumbago, sciatica, bronchial asthma, rheumatic fever, hay fever, snake and spider bites, scorpion stings and burns.

The different experiments discussed involved dosages up to 105 grams daily — more than one thousand times the recommended daily allowances endorsed by such agencies as the Food and Drug Administration in the United States. Of course, these dosages were used in the treatment of sometimes critical sickness, while the FDA recommendations are for people in good health. Nonetheless, Stone believes that even a healthy adult requires between three and five grams a day to maintain maximum resistance to disease.

Stone reports that a large amount of ascorbic acid eaten without other food may cause an upset stomach and diarrhea in some people, and so recommends that it be taken at the end of a meal, but admits no more serious side effects. He says it is no more toxic than ordinary sugar and far less toxic than salt.

Ascorbic acid crystals can be bought at the local pharmacy for about $15 per kilogram — 1.5 cents per gram. One level teaspoon is about four grams.

In the past year, since Dr. Stone's book, a fellow biochemist, the man who first isolated ascorbic acid, Albert Szent-Gyorgyi, MD., Ph. D. and Nobel Laureate, has revealed that the action of ascorbic acid is potentiated by wheat germ. According to Szent-Gyorgyi, the wheat germ glucosides split in the body forming methoxyhydroquinone and dimethoxyhydroquinone. The manganese of the wheat germ catalyzes the autooxidation of the methoxyhydroquinone present and hydrogen peroxide is formed along with the quinones. The quinones are then reduced by the ascorbic acid present, the ascorbic acid being oxidized to dehydroascorbic acid. The dehydroascorbic acid thus formed is then re-reduced to ascorbic acid, completing the peroxidase system.

Szent-Gyorgyi suggests 2 grams of ascorbic acid daily with 2 ounces of wheat germ.

Stone also presents a simple method of determining the relative illness of a patient:

In 1955, Chakrabarti and Banerjee determined both the ascorbic acid (reduced) and dehydroascorbic acid (oxidized) levels in the blood of many of their patients. They found that the ascorbic acid levels went down and dehydroascorbic acid levels went up as their patients became sicker and finally died from meningitis, tetanus, pneumonia and typhoid fever. If the patients survived, the trend was reversed. Hoffer and Osmond, in 1963, cited many other references relating to metal stress and metal disease affecting the ascorbic acid blood levels and also first calculated the ascorbic acid over dehydroascorbic acid ratios — morbidity indexes — which showed some startling statistics.

These figures are assembled in the accompanying table.

The normals had a morbidity index of about 14 although an individual taking higher levels of ascorbic acid would have an even higher index. Those who were critically sick but survived had a mortality index of about 1.0, while those who died had much their hyposcrobemia (vitamin C deficiency) been fully corrected by the use of more ascorbic acid daily.

There are so many references in the medical literature showing that ascorbic acid requirements are increased in old age and that the elderly suffer from serious depletion, that only a small sampling can be quoted here. Yavorsky, Almaden, King in 1934, showed that the ascorbic acid content of human tissues decreases with age. The ages varied from one day to 77 years in five groups and the tissues examined included the adrenals, brain, pancreas, liver, spleen, kidney, lung, heart and thymus. A substantial drop was shown in all cases.

Other references, indicating higher ascorbic acid requirements in the elderly and lower levels found in the body, are Rafsky and Newman, 1941; Thewlis and Gale 1947; Dawson and Bowers, 1961; Bowers and Kubik, 1965; Smolianski, 1965; Andrews and co-workers, 1966; O'Sullivan and co-workers, 1968; Mitra, 1970; and many more.

Smolianskii studied the effect of ascorbic acid on the production of important hormones from the adrenal glands of a group of 144 persons aged 60 to 90 years. He found that both the ascorbic acid blood levels and steroid hormone production were low. A single injection of only 500 milligrams of ascorbic acid increased the urinary excretion of these hormones, indicating a rise in their production by the adrenal gland. Continuing these injections produced further rises in hormone production. It is likely that if these elderly persons had been receiving adequate ascorbic acid over the years, their hormone production would have been maintained at youthful levels.

Business Briefs

Prescribing and manufacturing glasses can be profitable business, especially if you have the whole Ontario market in your back pocket.

That's the way it used to be in the good old days for Imperial Optical's Syd Hermant, known closer to home as a former SAC pres, and member of U of T's Governing council.

Since the province stepped in and broke up Imperial's control of the provincial Board of Ophthalmic Dispensers by eliminating four out of five Imperial reps on the five-man board, Imperial's profit showing is bound to take a small dive.

According to documents filed with the department of consumer and corporate affairs, Imperial's profit on income of $47,306,000 was $1,718,000 for the year ending December 31, compared to $1,230,000 in 1972.

All you vandals who steal from phone booths had better look for another source of income.

For the first three quarters of 1973, Bell Canada reduced the number of telephone larcenies by 33 per cent. Total money losses were down by $1,000 and equipment damages decreased $7,000.

All this crackdown brought a 1973 profit of $175 million, and paid a dividend of $4.40 a share.

Realizing the rampant injustice of this situation, Bell Canada president Jean de Grandpre proposed the company be allowed to increase its rate each year by one-half the growth rate of the consumer price index.

He claimed this would increase company revenue by $25 million, after tax profit by $10 million, and dividend per share by 23 cents.

Thanks a million, Ma Bell.

Defence committee disbands

By BARRY WEISLEDER

With few of its objectives achieved, the Artistic Defence Committee was disbanded Monday night by Canadian Textile and Chemical workers Union (CTCU) secretary treasurer Madeline Parent, but it appears that a modified defence campaign may be initiated nonetheless.

Parent dissolved the committee reportedly because conflicts between the union leaders and many of the arrested over the tactics of the defence were irreconcilable.

The union has backed down from holding demonstrations and other public actions in support of those going to trial, and has stressed a 'civil liberties' approach to the situation. Many of the defendants are demanding more militant and political strategy stressing the centrality of the strikebreaking question.

Many members of the defence committee, appointed a little over a month ago by the CTCU, were dismayed by Parent's action.

At least two Defence Committee members are supporting a call for a general meeting of the arrested strike supporters this Saturday in order to launch a new defence campaign. Place and time for the meeting have not yet been announced.

Cris Todd, one of the members of the now dissolved committee said: "We feel that it is essential to expose the political nature of the arrests at Artistic and campaign to get the charges dropped."

Tom Heffernan, chief steward with the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, Toronto local, and also a member of the dissolved committee, emphasized "the necessity to combat the strikebreaking and union-busting efforts of the employers and their allies in government."

"We can only do this by mounting a public political campaign to drop the charges," Heffernan said.

Chile: resistance grows, junta grip tightens

WINNIPEG (CUP) — Clandestine reports from Chile indicate both a growing resistance to the junta and a growing widespread attempt by the junta to establish tight control by any means necessary.

There were reports published in the newsletter of a California group favoring non-intervention in Chile, which is keeping track of the Chile situation. The exact source was not revealed because the groups wish to receive further reports.

Widespread dissatisfaction among people, housewives and farmers, the reports say, is expressing itself in derogatory jokes about the junta, defacing junta paper currency and writing slogans on fences.

Underground organizing and significant activity against the army is also reported.

The communist and Christian Democratic parties are reportedly discussing an anti-junta alliance.

The junta's campaign to establish control and guard against a recurrence of marxism is being waged on many fronts.

A seven-man commission of lawyers is writing a new constitution to replace the 1925 modification of Chile's original 1833 charter. The intent is to disenfranchise a large segment of the 45 per cent of Chileans who voted for the leftist parties.

Proportional representation will be abolished, while corporate groups of manufacturers and doctors will gain more political power, and popularly-elected candidates less.

The military will be autonomous and not under the control of the civilian government.

Purges of universities and high schools have been intensified.

Some professors are being given the choice between resigning or facing military trials.

Military principles are being appointed in high schools. "Dangerous subjects" such as the French revolution are being removed from the curriculum. Teachers are being classed in permanent files by ideological criteria, for instance as "possibly ideologically dangerous."

Local leaders of unions, strikers or regional organizers are being arrested or executed without trial.

Unapproved political parties are now outlawed as are political gatheings. The junta has announced that meetings are outlawed unless approved.

Neighbours are being urged to report any gatherings to the police.

Most of the major leaders of the Allende government have been placed on an island prison in the far south, reportedly without sufficient food, clothing or medical attention. Four have been returned to Santiago for hospitalization, one for treatment of a gangrene infection.

Twenty doctors have reportedly been killed or have disappeared since the coup.

The mayors of two cities have died in prison.

Reports of mass executions are frequent. In one case 27 copper workers were shot in an "escape attempt".

Some of the news is good however.

The vice-president of Italy during Mussolini's regime has sent a letter congratulating General Augusto Pinochet, head of the junta. American banks have made a dramatic turnaround in the availability of bank loans to Chile since the coup.

From a pre-Allende high of $300 million per year, credit for Chile had dropped to $30 million.

In the last four months, however, Chile has been granted over $19.5 million in loans.

Kruger seeks mix

TORONTO (CUP) — Now that the market for male Canadians is exhausted, it is time to open part-time degree programs to women and immigrants, according to the principal of the University of Toronto's new college for part time students.

Arthur Kruger, associate chairman of the department of political economy, whose appointment was announced January 9, said the college will make itself known to immigrants who often had no chance to attend university.

The college will explore possibilities for more off campus teaching particularly to attract working women.

"If industry is serious about upgrading women, they're going to have to provide women with time to acquire the skills of the men they work alongside."

Kruger noted that this was not a move to increase the student numbers, but in serving large numbers of people within the community who haven't yet been reached by the university. There are presently 11,000 part-time students at U of T.

Traffic light to be installed for trial period

By mid-March a traffic light is to be installed at the north end of Queen's Park Crescent for a trial period to see if it improves safety for pedestrians crossing Queen's Park Crescent West.

The decision came from Metro transportation committee Monday, and while it still technically needs approval of the full Metro Council, passage is virtually assured.

Following an introduction by K.S. Gregory of U of T's business affairs department, David Pelteret, a don at Victoria College, made a plea for the committee to put the light at Hoskin Avenue and Queen's park because few students would use the light at the north end for crossing.

However, the committee agreed with Metro roads commissioner, Sam Cass, who recommended the north end light.

In addition, the committee recommended the Toronto Transit Commission put signs up at the entrances to the Museum subway station indicating the entrances are also underground passage-ways across the road.

Cass was also instructed to conduct a study on the pedestrian traffic after the new light is installed and report back to the committee in June.

The light to be installed — at a cost of $9,000 — will control only southbound traffic at the northern intersection.

Westbound traffic around the north end of the crescent and Northbound traffic is to be controlled by the existing light near Victoria college which is to be synchronized with the north light, Cass said.

Pelteret said a university study in October showed more than 2,200 students cross the crescent near Hart House daily between 9 am and 5 pm.

Most of those crossing are bunched during the 10-minute breaks between classes as students dash from one end of the campus to the other.

Pelteret disagreed with a report by Cass which indicated no accidents on Queen's Park West near Hoskin.

Pelteret said while that may be technically true, at least three students had been injured last term further north on the west side.

The most serious injury was suffered by Isabelle Mikosza, a second-year french student at Trinity who had her spleen removed after being hit by a bus in November.

Pelteret said two other students he knew received minor injuries in traffic accidents.

The Cass report has been one of the main stumbling blocks in getting the light approved by Metro because Metro officials said they did not want to commit themselves to any kind of action without the report.

However, the report drew sharp criticism from Pelteret who said Cass dealt mainly with the problems of traffic flow and not with the problems of pedestrian crossing.

The main reason Cass rejected the Hoskin light was the risk of traffic accidents should such a light be installed.

"Accident records reveal a pattern of collisions between vehicles at the approach to Hoskin Avenue caused by a weaving movement of traffic originating from the east crescent and proceeding around the top of the crescent and then crossing to go west on Hoskin Avenue," the report said.

"Traffic signals at Queen's Park Crescent West and Hoskin Avenue would aggravate this accident potential by making it more difficult for the westbound traffic to enter Hoskin Avenue in view of the queues which may be present at the signals," Cass said in his report.

In a classic effort at compromise Ward 6 alderman William Archer proposed the northend traffic light "as soon as possible" with a study to be done late this term so the university could respond by fall if changes were felt to be needed.

Pelteret had urged the committee to install two lights, one at Hoskin and the other further south on the crescent, but that suggestion never got past the proposal stage.

University president John Evans was on the committee's agenda to make a presentation, but sent a letter saying he could not make it.

The letter said U of T's Governing Council had passed a resolution supporting the Hoskin light, which forced Gregory to apologize to the Metro committee because in fact Governing Council had passed no such resolution — the internal affairs committee had.

"I can assure you that the Governing Council will pass such a motion," Gregory said.

Wing Nip reports last weekend, the men's fencing club hosted RMC at Hart House. The epee team of Dave Harner, Rod Toms, John Roth, Abu Nazin and Wing Nip beat their counterparts by winning nine of the possible fifteen bouts. The saber team, however, of Robert Vizod, Tom Ladanyi, Joel Woster and J. Ferngach did not do so well and lost three to nine. In foil, even the straight victories of Bernard Tsui could not save them from losing four to eight to RMC's first team and five to seven to their second team. Other members of the Toronto foil team were Bob O'Hoski, Steve Taylor and Honard Goodman.

Janet Clarke reports on January 7, the female Engineers beat Vic B 4-2, even though Vic B led 2-1 going into the second period. Scoring for the Engineers were Stewart, Couperwaithe, Escedi and Kajak. Breithaupt and Hawey scored for Vic. The Vic B team came back on January 9, defeating PHE II B 3-1. The PHE goal was Ms Heath's, with Breithaupt, McRae and Achmatowicz scoring one each for Vic. PHE, even with S. Scott's two goals, were defeated by the combined efforts of the SMC A team's O'Hara and McLellan, who accounted for their team's three goals. PHE tied its game with the Pharmacy females. Pharmacy led going into the third with Snodgrass' goal, but Toogood tied it up in the final period. Bennett, Sumutuh, and Steacy for Trinity, outscored Med's Sims and Scully 3-2.

... Toronto wrestlers took part in the Montreal Open over the weekend. Rob Moore placed seventh in the 136.5 pound class. In his first matches he won by a pin. And then by a decision (16-3) over a Newtonbrook wrestler. Unfortunately, he then lost by a decision (23-3) to a member of Northwestern University from Chicago. In his last bout, he lost by a pin to a grappler from NYAC. Steve Tisberger wrestled in the 149.5 class. He lost by decisions (4-1) and (3-2) to wrestlers of the Montreal Wrestling Club and Aporue. Roman Preobrazenski placed third in the heavyweight division. He defeated Chamberon from the Pal National Club, winning by decision 6-2. In his next bout, Preobrazenski lost by decision (2-3) to Shimacher from NYAC. He regained his winning ways though, winning by decision (6-3) over Pike of Pal National. In his last bout, the Toronto heavyweight lost by a pin (0-4) to Wojciehowski from Toledo. Toronto competes tonight at 7 pm against Ryerson in their main gym.

Interfac hockey settles scores gastronomically

Let's follow it and see what it eats.
— old Runic inscription

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

We followed interfac hockey for the past few days and here's what we found

Law II devoured Scar II 3-1. The wine was good, the seats were adequate and Williamson scored for Scar. The official goal tasters for Law were Armstrong, Cummings and Sheen.

Grad I beat Sr Eng 5-2. Harvey, Multo, Zuliani, McLaren and Loolwhiie enjoyed a sumptuous scoring repast for the grads while the engineers dined sparsely on goals by Mitchelson and Kosliuk.

St. Mike's had a grand bouffe, slogging eight goals against Grad II. Coleniso, Hamilton, Michachi, Longo and Boot were the hungry gluttons. Showing more restraint were the gentlemen from Grad II who refused to satisfy their scoring appetites in public.

Some roistering lads from Erin gave Meds A a taste of their own medicine by forcing a 4-0 defeat down the reluctant doctor's throats. We're told it was a meal in itself. Chylinski, Sloane, Breuen and Sly devilishly supplied the goals before returning to the green and rolling hills of Erin

Intermediate hockey

Now we're going to see how the other half eats.

The Rabble, who no longer have Rice on their menu, beat Trin D 11-1. Even without a woman in their lineup, Anderson, Brown, Kuja (2), Meyer (3), Williams (3) and Godfrey managed to score while Parker penned a goal for Trin.

St. Mike's F outlasted Civil IV 4-2. Feerick and Zuliani notched a goal each for the warlike F's while Prouse replied for the civilians.

Eng NY I roasted Chem II 1-0. Actually, only three players from Chem showed up but then, this is a free country.

St. Mike's C gnawed Law III 7-0.

Cescon (2), Longo (3) and Grimby grimly satisfied their strange hungers and we won't delve into the matter any further.

Pharm B barbecued Med F 9-1. Matello, Campigotto, Snunton, Mikello (2), Kelly, Pick and Tang were the voracious Pharm scorers. Singer scored the only goal for Meds.

The Grungies struck for six goals and that was enough to down Dent II who only managed five. Smith, Ames, Jansen (3), and brace yourself, the inimitable Brace did the grunting (they blushed at the intramural office when we asked them what it meant).

Sad to say, Gibson, Venvitti, Melbourne and Tibar were the only Dents who managed to grunge for their team. But such, dear friend, is life...

With the UC goalie down, a St. Mike's player (23) is about to set up a goal by his team-mate.

Alpine skiing on the upsurge at U of T

Doug Carter of Toronto.

There were 11 participating universities last year, many coached by students who also raced or by recent alumnae-racers.

Last season was unique in that points were awarded to the top ten individuals and schools in each race so that "series winners" could be declared at the end as in hockey, football or other team sports.

The points were awarded in a narrow spread (10-9-8, ..., 2-1) so competition was keen in every race and standings were continually changing.

Women were only included in three of six events last year but this year, they will participate in all six meets and eight races.

With such a schedule, it is hoped that in the next few years the level of women's competitions can be raised as more racers carry on or come out of retirement when they come to university.

The men's and women's ski teams combined their training sessions this year and the attendance rate was quite good. Dry land practices were held for one hour Monday and Tuesday afternoons in October, November and December and continue through the winter on Mondays.

This year, an on-snow Christmas camp was held January 2-4, at Blue Mountain in Collingwood. Many of the team members attended and had good training through giant slalom and slalom courses under hard-packed conditions.

Coaches were men's team members Curtis Eastmure and Rod Behan for the men and Doug Carter for the women. Doug was aided by Rick Bagg, an alumnus of the team.

Toronto has not yielded a strong women's team in the past few years. Last year they placed fifth behind Waterloo, Queen's, McMaster and Trent, based on the three race series.

Anne McGreer, tenth in the series individual standings, was the only U of T woman to finish in the top ten. Only returnee to this year's team is Ann Seymour, one of the better performers from last year.

New members include Margot Hamilton, a freshman, one of Southern Ontario's better C class racers; Chris Bagg, former C cardholder from Oshawa; Diana Cooper, also racing from Oshawa and Celia Graham.

The girls have all benefited considerably from the three day camp and should do well on Friday.

U of T men have done well in recent years, placing second only to Carleton last year. Everyone has returned this year, including Curtis Eastmure, who was on sabbatical last year in a secret training hideaway on the beach (?) in Spain.

Mike Bulger and Britt Roberts have been particularly impressive in training. Doug Carter is last year's series individual champion. Other members are Rod Behan, a southern Ontario A class racer, and Al Abbott.

The back-up team who will be entered this Friday have some promising racers including Paul Leitch (a newcomer) and Paul Gordon and Fred Lenz.

Steve Tisberger, left, puts the "whizzer and the hip pop" hold on Rob Moore, right. The Toronto wrestlers are preparing for a competition at Ryerson tonight.

B'ball Blues win

Over the weekend the Basketball Blues took the long ride up to Sudbury to play Laurentian. Their trip was rewarded when they squeaked out an 81-80 victory.

In the first half, Toronto used a 2-1-2 zone and Laurentian used a man-to-man full court press.

The score stayed close throughout the half but Toronto finally took a four point lead. At the halftime buzzer Toronto lead 44-40.

In the second half, Toronto started out fast and built up a 15 point lead.

But, with seven minutes remaining, and Toronto leading 70-55, Laurentian fought back.

With Laurentian pressing, Toronto's scoring punch spluttered and they missed several foul shots and lay-ups.

But Toronto recovered from this momentary peril and built up a five point lead. Then in a wild finish they eked out the important victory by a single point.

Toronto's league record now is an excellent 5-1.

No discipline negotiations now

Some SAC members are presently negotiating with the administering over the discipline code.

Such actions are an unprecedented and unjustified.

The discipline code must be rejected.

It will never be accepted by the thousands of students represented by the Students' Administrative Council, the Association of Part-time Students or the Graduate Students Association.

History has shown at this university the administration and faculty do not listen to rational or informed debate by students.

That fact was most evident in the 1971 U of T Act debate in the legislature. Students made the better arguments and the Minister of Colleges and Universities, John White, understood this.

However the combined pressure of faculty and administration forced the government to double track.

The faculty actually threatened to close down the university! But when students attempt to protest against recognized injustices they are told they must be disciplined with a code.

Negotiations proved fruitless over the library, day-care and more recently math demonstrations. Day care was quickly shuffled into the committee stage and the Devonshire day care centre is still occupying the observatory building two years after. The occupiers learned that the university is not sensitive to the legitimate demands of students and the community.

The library demonstration was backed up by over 5,000 student signatures calling for open stack access but Simcoe Hall refused to listen.

Simcoe Hall provoked the sit-in that led to Metro police being called on campus and students arrested and injured.

Then acting-president Jack Sword 'caved in' to student demands after 500 students surged into the Senate chambers in response to the Metro police tactics. However, Sword was later outfoxed by the Senate which overruled his decision to allow open stack access.

Sword listened but the Senate didn't. The Senate members, confronted for the first time with solid student demands cried "intimidation' and voted down the students demands as approved by Sword and the other 'negotiators.'

When students threaten to close down the university the administration calls in the police. When faculty and administration threaten to 'shut the university down' the provincial government relents and accedes to their demands.

President John Evans is worried about his nice-guy, liberal image. He is a master at the art of negotiation and 'co-optation'. He is leading the student council down a garden path that will put yet another nail in the coffin of the student movement.

The code will not be accepted. Students will leave the university and others will replace them, but the campus press (for one) will continue to reiterate the position we have taken on discipline since the fall of 1969.

Unfortunately the students' representatives have changed their tune in a short four years. The 1969-70 Students Administrative Council was firmly opposed to the any disciplinary structures. Gus Abols, now Governing Council alumnus member was SAC president.

When former U of T president Claude Bissell came down with the law-and-order statement in early September, 1969, SAC replied: "...It is not possible to discuss discipline if one of the positions held by the administration is repression and the destruction of democracy. If the students are to have their elementary rights to free speech, to organize, and to academic freedom repressed, then we can no longer deal with the administration in good faith. As SAC representative Bob Rae said "one does not 'discuss menus with cannibals.'"

We think it's about time the SAC, APUS, and the GSU started expressing their written statements through action.

Marshmallow politics won't solve the problem. The administration will form yet another committee.

The discipline code will force students at this university into a most difficult, compromising position.

At the beginning of the week the student's administrative council had received close to 2,- 000 cards and petition signatures calling for the code's rejection. Student politicians cannot argue that they have no student support. Where students' basic rights are on the line we are convinced they will respond.

Students must organize for the Governing Council meeting next Thursday. Discipline and the code are on the agenda.

If the code isn't stopped students will be subjected to one of the most repressive documents ever seen in a Canadian university. Of all universities in Canada, only a few contain discipline codes. The U of T does not need the Code of Behaviour.

The Code of Behaviour must be rejected. Student politicians and all those connected with the opposition to the code on or off campus must soundly defeat the Code.

Next Thursday the Governing Council must be served notice that students will not tolerate suppression of their basic human rights.

The code must go. Students must organize to increase the nearly 2,000 who now support rejection of the code.

U of T chancellor McGibbon named Lieut.-Governess

Titular head of U of T Pauline McGibbon becomes titular head of Ontario.

By BOB GAUTHIER

A blow for women's lib? Well, not really...

U of T chancellor Pauline McGibbon got the official nod last night from Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau and now is officially to become Ontario's first Lieutenant-Governess.

Reportedly, she said she'd have to ask her husband first before giving an answer.

McGibbon is one of the "One Big Happy Family" set, or, as some people call it, the "Simcoe Circle."

Late yesterday afternoon McGibbon told the Varsity Trudeau had phoned her around 5:30 pm Wednesday to ask if she would let her name stand.

The Varsity asked McGibbon about her positions on the boards of directors of companies and whether these would affect her status as lieutenant-governess. She replied: "If I become the lieutenant-governor I would resign."

McGibbon presently sits on the boards of directors of IBM and Imasco. IBM alone supplies the U of T with all of its computers; McGibbon is this university's chancellor, appointed in October 1971.

IBM has been the target of a recent series of articles in the Globe and Mail. The Globe has investigated possible IBM monopoly over Ontario government computer purchases and whether that makes the provincial government dependent upon the company.

McGibbon's husband, Donald Walker McGibbon, also has close connections with the U of T. As treasurer of Imperial Oil Limited, a member of the Board of Regents of Victoria Council, and a member of the council of the Ontario College of Art, the male McGibbon is in close proximity to his corporate colleagues.

Coincidentally, Governing Council member W.O. Twiss is the chairman and chief executive officer of Imperial Oil. Also, W.D. Archbold, Imperial's marketing vice-president and general manager was recently appointed a special executive assistant to president John Evans.

U of T also has major investments in Imperial Oil. According to financial statements released by the business affairs committee December 20, U of T owns $3.3 million worth of Imperial Oil shares as of the end of October. However, this figure was down from its earlier holding of $4.2 million.

Proceeds from the sales are now re-invested by the university in the Endowed Funds Investment Pool, which also includes mortgage and bond holdings.

McGibbon was appointed U of T's first woman chancellor in late October 1971. Born in 1910 in Sarnia, she graduated from Victoria University (college) with a BA in modern history in 1933. In 1967 she received a law degree from the University of Alberta.

Before moving to Toronto in 1940 McGibbon was Regent of the Municipal Chapter of the International Order of the Daughters of the Empire (IODE) in Sarnia.

She went on to hold various offices in her Primary Chapter in Sarnia and Toronto, including that of Regent in both cases.

McGibbon became Regent of the Municipal Chapter in Toronto from 1950-53 and a member of the provincial executive committee from 1939 to 1956.

She then worked her way up to become a member of the National Executive Committee (1948) and became president of the National Chapter from 1963-5.

A protestant, McGibbon is also a Dame in the Order of St. Lazarus of Jerusalem.

U of T president John Evans paid McGibbon a compliment shortly after the official announcement that he was to be U of T's new president. Evans said in November, 1971, "You're a nice lady. I look forward to working with you".

SAC negotiators can't budge admin

The U of T Governing Council is willing to impose the Code of Behavior on students even if students are overwhelmingly opposed, student representatives negotiating with the administration said last night.

"By saying that consensus from students is only desirable, and by refusing to say that it is essential, the administration indicates it will impose the code on students without their consent. 'Victoria College SAC rep Rick Gregory told a general meeting of the Students' Administrative Council.

Gregory was one of several SAC figures actively negotiating with administration and governing council officials this week in an attempt to reach a settlement of the discipline dispute.

SAC president Bob Anderson another negotiator, said although internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway asked the Governing Council executive committee to recognize the necessity of campus-wide consensus on discipline, the committee refused.

"Today (U of T president John) Evans did not back her fully either," Anderson said.

SAC reps unanimously approved a motion "that no discipline code can be implemented at U of T without the expressed approval of the students"

Opposition to the Code of Behavior has been officially expressed by the Student Medical Society, the Nursing and Music Student Councils, Victoria, Trinity Innis and New College student councils and other student organizations.

It is also opposed by all eight student members of the governing council and the three central student unions on campus. In addition students have been signing petitions expressing their own personal rejection of the code.

Student negotiators have elicited from university officials the promise of continuing negotiations. If "substantial progress" is made by March, the officials say, sections of the code causing little opposition can be passed then. The other sections may be delayed until next January.

But the University of Toronto Faculty Association demands that any offenders under sections not agreed to in negotiations continue to be judged by the Caput, the university's current supreme disciplinary body. (The Caput consists of the deans of faculties and principals of colleges.) Indications are that the administration will accept the faculty demands wholeheartedly.

SAC last night headed off an attack against negotiating with the administration.

Joliette strike settled

JOLIETTE (CUP) The 10 month Firestone strike in Joliette is over. The strikers voted, overwhelmingly, Sunday January 13, to accept the contract offers put forward by the company, last Wednesday, and to return to work.

In what has been described as a 95 per cent victory by the union, the union signed a three year contract that will see increases of 70 cents an hour the first year and 26 cents an hour in the next two. The wage increases will give the workers very close to parity with Firestone's plant in Hamilton. They're retroactive to September, 1973.

But more important than the financial gains are the other gains won by the workers who defied the international United Rubber Workers Union to beat the company.

The official language of work will be French and grievances will be heard in French.

The union also won better security in the face of technical change and an increase in payment to those employees working on a piece work.

A spokesman for the Firestone workers, Roger Pelletier, said the struggle was an exemplary one for the labor movement. Solidarity committees were set up throughout the province. Rank and file structures were established to allow for more worker participation in negotiations. Workers throughout the province broke out of their isolation to launch the boycott of Firestone.

The strike begun to resemble other bitter struggles in the Quebec labour movement with violent clashes and government intervention on the side of the company.

Four more years for Food Sciences faculty

By MARINA STRAUSS

Contrary to popular rumor, the Faculty of Food Sciences will be alive and well for the next four years.

Despite the Governing Council's decision last month to phase out the faculty and create a new Department of Nutrition and Food Science, faculty dean Ira Armstrong revealed last night she has received "authority from the vice-provost to register new students next September."

"That means the faculty will continue as it is at present for four years," she affirmed.

Armstrong admitted to being surprised by the prolonged future of the faculty.

"I think many people were surprised," she said.

"The Governing Council's recommendations sounded as if it (the faculty's phasing out) was going to happen overnight."

Vice-provost J.D. Hamilton confirmed the present program "will go on for four years."

He has guaranteed students now registered in the faculty they will continue in the program they started in and will receive the degree for which they originally registered.

Of the thorny problem of the present faculty staff's fate Hamilton insisted every member will be found a post in the university. "Nobody will be fired," he said.

The university has pledged to "make every effort" to find jobs for the current faculty staff, which is consistent with a recommendation of the Forster report on hiring and firing.

The new department of nutrition and food science will combine the resources of the faculty of food sciences with the nutrition department of the school of hygiene in the areas of nutrition, dietetics and food chemistry.

The move to create the new department came despite pleas of students, faculty and alumni of the faculty to dump the plan for centralization which has been in the works for three years.

"The Governing Council's recommendation is basically designed to set up a new department to consolidate resources in nutrition," Hamilton explained.

"New programs in household sciences and in nutrition and dietetics will be developed," he said. He pointed out nutrition courses exist in many faculties across campus, and the new department will "consolidate all nutrition courses and people who teach them."

Hamilton admitted as the new department is being set up. "There will be an overlapping of courses" in it and the food sciences faculty but, he added, "this happens every time a faculty phases out."

Although the faculty's lawyers claim the university is breaching the terms of the Lillian Massey Treble will of 1906 which stipulates the Massey building should be turned over to Victoria College if the teaching of food sciences is abolished, dean Armstrong maintained she did not intend to take legal action against the university.

Hamilton considered the issue of the will "a red herring."

"As long as we continue to offer a program" he contended, "there are no legal problems with the will."

He noted it was the "opinion of the faculty's lawyer, and not of the university solicitors (Casells-Brock)," that the university was violating the will.

"The building will stay," he said, adding the new department of nutrition and food science will take it over.

"There are two big changes—the dropping of the name of faculty of food sciences and the developing of a new program with the phasing out of existing ones," Hamilton stipulated.

The faculty's law firm argues the university is breaking the agreement of Treble's will by discontinuing the faculty as it is.

"I have had no contact with the administration," she admitted, "and I haven't been in touch with the university president."

Briefs on tenure sought

The Governing Council's subcommittee to decide on mechanisms for student representation on tenure committees decided last night to seek submissions from all university groups as well as other universities.

The committee, which has parity faculty-student representation, decided to meet in open session to discuss the thorny question.

The Forster task force decided last year to reject student representation because it could not decide on any mechanism for choosing the student members.

Professor Bruce Dunlop said the Forster task force, of which he was a member, had decided the major obstacle to student representation was the lack of a good selection process.

Dove told the group there was a large variation in tenure committee practices in the university so the committee should seek information about the practices in different departments.

Students voted in October by a two to one margin to demand parity student representation on all hiring, firing, promotion and tenure committees.

The sub-committee was a result of pressure by SAC at the October meeting of the academic affairs committee. The committee voted to establish a four member sub-committee to consider how students could be selected for the staffing committees.

However chairman John Dove told yesterday's meeting the academic affairs committee would be the deciding body on the principle of student representation.

The assumption the committee will proceed on in its consideration is that teaching quality and scholarship will be given equal consideration in tenure decisions.

Bill Dunphy said otherwise there might be different criteria for selection of student members.

Despite the delay in the meeting of the committee they will meet every week in order to come up with a solution to the question of how to select students.

The delay was the result of not being approved by the Governing Council until December. SAC had suggested it be an ad-hoc group, thus avoiding the delay caused by ratification and following that the selection of members from among the members of the academic affairs committee.

Independent publishers are 'idiots': McClelland

By KATHERINE ROWCLIFFE

A "small group of militant idiots" were the initial organizers of the Independent Publisher's Association, asserted Canadian publisher Jack McClelland in an address at Hart House Tuesday evening.

The past chairman of the Committee for an Independent Canada said he refused to close doors in an attempt to nurture a culture.

McClelland made it clear that he welcomed competition. "Publishing," he said, "is the last bastion of free enterprise."

He admitted unless the Ontario government had subsidized his own publishing firm, he would have accepted an American offer rather than close and forfeit the $3 million other people had invested in it.

He did, however, criticize the generous subsidies given to new Canadian publishing firms, which distorts their sense of the market and creates artificial competition.

He explained a publisher who invests his own capital will be, on the whole, more discriminating in his choice of manuscripts than one who is heavily subsidized.

Of the four to five thousand manuscripts sent to McClelland and Stewart each year, 50 per cent are rejected after a first reading. McClelland spent most of the evening describing the process of elimination.

Manuscripts chosen for publication have been read at least seven or eight times by professional readers and editors. McClelland said the majority of books published by his company are either commissioned or written by prominent authors.

McClelland stressed the role of the author in promoting his own book. He claimed he could probably make as fair a decision by talking with the author for an hour as by reading the manuscript.

"We basically publish the person rather than the manuscript," he said.

Today's author is a public person, he explained, and gave the example of Gabrielle Roy who he said was the best author in Canada 10 years ago. McClelland attributed the decline in her popularity today to her refusal to submit to public appearances and interviews.

Publishing is a bastion of free enterprise, says Jack McClelland, whose firm was bailed out by the government.

Liberal vows Tory Trinity

By BOB BETTSON

Jack Pickersgill, former cabinet minister in the Pearson government reminisced last night in front of the up and coming lights of Forest Hill and Bay Street about why he is a Liberal.

He was invading Trinity College, noted for its conservatism home of many of the aspiring elite and managed to get a good reception from the blue Tory audience.

A sign in the back of Strachan Hall, the exclusive dining hall, said "Vote CCF or Tory, anything but Liberal."

The occasion was the first annual banquet of the Trinity Joint Literary Institute. For the first time women are members of the traditional college institution affectionately known as "the Lit."

Pickersgill told the audience there should always be one Tory government every generation so they could return the Liberals the next time.

He said for the first 20 years of his life before he joined the Liberal party, he was a die hard Tory but found his "light on the way to Damascus," and joined MacKenzie King's Liberals in 1926.

Pickersgill, who hails from the Maritimes, told the audience he was basically a pragmatic politician who never was "attracted to the ideology of the CCF."

He said the CCF and its successor the NDP were guilty of "social intolerance," and called socialism "arrant nonsense."

"If someone wants to be a Tory that's his right, but I feel sorry for him," he added.

Defining a Conservative as someone who believes he has the right to govern, he said the Liberals were the party of all the people as opposed the CCF who believe only the virtuous should rule.

He said his great hero was former prime minister Louis St. Laurent. Lamenting the Liberal defeats in 1957 and 1958 he said every generation must have a Tory government "to give the Liberal's a chance at being the opposition."

Besides, he mused, "we got rid of some dead wood."

He argued although he made a partisan speech, "it is possible to be both partisan and objective."

Canada is the only country in the world that has not had a political dispute ending in bloodshed, "he noted."

Trinity poses dilemma

President John Evans said he had no comment on a possible conflict between the Haist rules and a motion being considered by the Trinity College Council putting students on staffing committees.

Evans, when interviewed yesterday, refused to say which rules would apply if his plan for changing the combined departments in college subjects into university departments were effected.

Evans said each case would have to be decided on "its own merits."

He also said negotiations were not the correct term to describe his talks with the colleges. "We are trying now to summarize the positive aspects of agreement for a progress report to the academic affairs committee of the Governing Council," he said.

He defended his concept of centralization but said it would be organizational, not physical. This was in response to protests by the colleges about indiscriminate centralization.

Although Evans wants to implement centralization "as soon as possible," he admitted it would have to be a "phased implementation."

The federated colleges will have to approve any new policies, he implied.

Varg pushes haccuracy

Should The Varsity turn over a new leaf and start stressing—haccuracy—accuracy??? This will undoubtedly be a hot topic of discussion as the Varsity staff assemblies at 1 pm today for its weekly orgy of self-criticism. It's at 91 St. George, and all staff should attend.

SAC votes to issue ultimatum to Bissell

The Students Administrative Council and 300 students at a mass meeting have thrown their weight behind the position taken by the SAC executive Tuesday in defiance of the two statements on discipline issued by the administration last week.

At its Wednesday night meeting SAC voted 28 to 6, with 5 abstentions, to demand:

- that President Bissell officially disassociate himself from the Committee of Presidents of Universities in Ontario working paper, since the paper has nothing in common with the Campbell committee report and since it is not possible to support both reports;

- that Caput withdraw its position of Saturday;
- that no new disciplinary action be taken until after the Campbell report is published;

- that the university recognize that Caput is not a legitimate disciplinary body for dealing with student discipline and that further discipline be dealt with by a committee representative of the university community;

- that the Campbell committee report be published as soon as it is presented to the president;

- that the administration reply to these demands within one week.

Bissell gets seven days

Mass meeting backs SAC demands

By MARY BASTEDO

A decision to support the six Students' Administrative Council demands was made by about 300 people yesterday — less than half the crowd of over 1,000 that assembled in Convocation Hall two hours earlier at 1 p.m.

The mass meeting was called Tuesday by those who attended the meeting of the committee to reconstitute Caput, which dissolved in chaos in the Hart House debates room.

After the administration has been given a week to retract its statements another mass meeting will be held next Wednesday to decide on further action.

President Bissell was present at yesterday's meeting. He sat and listened while last year's SAC President Stephen Langdon read a series of statements from various campus groups — SAC, the executive of the Graduate Students Union, the New Left Caucus, the Young Socialist Forum, the U of T Communist Club and Radicals for Capitalism.

All except Radicals for Capitalism condemned Bissell's stand and demanded he repudiate his statements.

LONG APPLAUSE

Prolonged applause, whether of expectation, anger or approval, greeted Bissell's approach to the podium.

He read again the letter he sent to SAC Wednesday night, which Langdon had just finished reading

"... no university can survive..."

"No capitalist university," someone shouted.

Applause

THREAT OF FORCE

"... if it acts under force or the threat of force..."

"I have no doubt whatsoever that these principles are acceptable to the U of T."

Heckling.

"Who let these Commies in here, anyway?" someone else shouted.

Bissell said he looked upon the Campbell committee report as "the document on which this university should make its decisions on campus discipline."

NO REPUDIATION

He did not directly repudiate either his statements lauding the usefulness of the CPUO working paper or the Caput statement.

"Really what we are engaged in today is part of the wider discussion — can the university govern itself?" he said.

"I think there are considerable doubts now that the university can govern itself."

After a series of frustrated questions to Bissell the crowd broke into a chant of "Retract! Retract!"

CONSULTS UNIVERSITY

"Most of these questions are directed not at me but at certain bodies of the university,"

Bissell shouted angrily. "It's a very flattering image you have of me as one who pontificates on high, but that is not the case. I can assure you I consult the university and that is what I intend to continue to do," he exclaimed, hitting the podium with his fist.

With that he left the room, red-faced and grinning.

"I personally feel that Dr. Bissell has broken a promise to us and has to repudiate his statement," said SAC president Gus Abols.

"I am totally in favour of mass meetings. People's rights are at stake here. We're all in it together no matter what you believe at this stage."

"It is my opinion that real physical violence or destruction of property is not condoned by most of the people on this campus."

FREE SPEECH

"People have the right of assembly to discuss whatever they want without interference."

"But the right of confrontation must be defined."

Andy Wernick, a New Left Caucus member, sat on the stage with Barkwell, Bissell, Langdon and others but he did not say anything during the meeting.

After an hour of people discussing and people leaving, the decision to support SAC in its ultimatum demands to the administration was almost unanimous.

Vic reviews discipline code

Reaction to the Cadario-Conway discipline code has come from several quarters on campus. SAC and its steering committee, the Graduate Students' Union, and the Association of Part-Time University Students have rejected the code; some Trinity students have serious reservations about it.

Last autumn, internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway invited a response to the Cadario-Conway Code by the federated universities. This invitation was relayed to President G.S. French of Victoria University by President John Evans. Because of its autonomy as a federated university, Vic is not bound to accept the Cadario-Conway Code in its present form; indeed VUSAC (the Victoria University Students' Administrative Council) has passed a motion rejecting the Cadario-Conway Code in its present form.

A three person committee, one Board of Regents member, one faculty, and one student, together with President French, have been reviewing the Cadario-Conway Code. A few clauses have been deleted, others clarified. Some of the liberal spirit of the Campbell Report has been infused into Vic's version of Cadario-Conway. There seems to be a consensus among the committee members that non-violent, non-disruptive demonstrations are a legitimate means of presenting grievances. Specific responses to the problem of double jeopardy and the possible use of the conspiracy clauses to suppress political activity have not been finally formulated. However, the Vic committee is seeking to ensure that the revised Code functions to protect rather than prosecute. At this point, the Vic committee has temporarily suspended its meetings until Governing Council reacts formally to SAC's protests against Cadario-Conway.

Conacher rights 'untrue' account

I wish to correct an error in your reporter's account of the academic standards committee (entitled "Varg Reporter closes meeting").

The untrue statement to which I allude runs as follows: "Professor D. J. Conacher echoed another member's feeling that the reporter, Bob Bettson should be physically removed if he was so 'calously indifferent to reason'."

What I actually said was that I agreed with the view expressed by an earlier speaker that we should not change the order of this agenda because of "the situation" (i.e., the situation caused by Mr. Bettson's presence). I then added the request to Dean Greene, as Chairman, that he again, formally request Mr. Bettson to leave, now that he, Mr. Bettson, had had the opportunity of hearing the discussion of the matter by the committee members and their reasons (including that of the unwillingness of the student petitioner to have her petition heard in his presence) for urging his withdrawal. I did NOT state or imply agreement with the suggestion which had been previously made that Mr. Bettson should be "physically removed".

This misstatement by your reporter might well have been due to a simple misunderstanding of what I said but since it is a matter of some importance and, indeed, principle, to me, I think that it should be corrected.

In another matter, however, the account did seem to suggest slanted reporting. As Mr. Bettson is well aware, the chief difficulty which members of the standards committee found in allowing the presence of a student reporter was the fact that the first item on the agenda concerned a student petition and that the student herself had indicated that she wanted a closed meeting. Mr. Bettson gave no encouragement to the possibility, raised by more than one member of the committee, that he might be invited to attend during the other items on the agenda while withdrawing during the hearing of the student petition. In the Varsity report, however, mention of the central issue is not given the prominence which it had in the discussion; indeed, it is not even mentioned until the sixth paragraph of the report.

This sort of reporting does not encourage much confidence in Varsity reporting of committee meetings and yet The Varsity insists on the importance of this reporting as an information service to the academic community.

Dean blasts bad boy Bettson

The report in Monday's Varsity of the meeting of the academic standards committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science was, to understate the case, considerably distorted and very misleading.

Varsity regular Bob Bettson... "Aw jeez, I'm in the dog house again."

When committees of the faculty consider petitions of individual students they do so in closed session so that personal details such as those relating to an individual's family life, health and general circumstances are not made public information. As the case in question well illustrates, many students are reluctant to allow such information to be discussed in meetings open to the public. The fact that students are aware that their cases are not considered in public session undoubtedly encouraged those concerned to keep their own affairs private to petition when they would otherwise not do so. The committee on standing and the academic standards committee therefore consider individual petitions and appeals in closed session, not, in the tendentious language of the article, in "secret" sessions. It should also be pointed out that the committee on standing has added student members this year for its discussions of policy, and that the academic standards committee does not meet in camera, except in the case of the appeals from individuals mentioned above.

The final paragraph of the article was a deliberate distortion of the facts in its clear implication, thrice repeated, that I somehow misrepresented the student's wishes, or influenced her unduly. The facts are that the student was "indifferent to the question" only in the sense that she was unaware of the possible presence of a Varsity reporter until I told her of it, and that she was very clear and very definite in her view that she did not wish her appeal to be heard in an open session of the committee.

Three days before the meeting I had left a message for Mr. Bettson at the Varsity office to inform him that he would not be allowed to be present for this one item on the committee's agenda. He insisted on attending and refused to leave claiming that "the rights of students are unimportant when compared to the freedom of the press." I consulted the student, who was waiting in an adjoining room, and told Mr. Bettson of her objection to his presence. The article states that "She made no comment herself." The fact is that she was never present at the meeting, because she had not yet been called in to present her case.

A further point entirely omitted from the account was the so-called "policy decision" of the Varsity, repeatedly alleged by Mr. Bettson as the reason for his refusal to leave the meeting, that in future no Varsity reporter would honour or observe the regulations governing in camera meetings of university committees.

I am writing now to protest the shameful disregard for truth in this report, especially the misrepresentation of the final paragraph. Furthermore, I should like to ask whether

Robert A. Greene, dean
Faculty of Arts and Science

(Ed. Bob Bettson, by staff vote, has been indefinitely banned from covering academic standards committee meetings until further staff consideration. The Varsity has not approved the policy described by Bettson to the members of the committee. The Varsity's policy is to respect a student's decision not to have reporters present if he or she desires. However, The Varsity does not recognize closed meetings where the student wishes the matter to be made public. As we stated at the Governing Council's December meeting we see little reason for restricted information in a public institution, except in certain special circumstances, such as that mentioned above.)

Reporter abused student's rights

Under the headline "Varg reporter closes meeting" the Monday January 14th issue of the Varsity carried a story of a recent academic standards committee meeting that is totally inaccurate in fact and in implication. As one who was anonymously and falsely quoted in that report I feel I have a right and an obligation to put the record straight.

When the committee met on Friday Mr. Bettson, as a Varsity reporter, was in the room. The first item of business was to listen to a student making an appeal in person against evaluation of her last spring's work. Instead Dean Greene informed the meeting that the student had said she would not appear as long as a Varsity reporter was present. The meeting immediately agreed that, in deference to the student's wishes, that item of the agenda could not be proceeded with unless Mr. Bettson could be persuaded to see reason and to leave the meeting. Mr. Bettson could not. He was then asked to make a statement in justification of his obstinacy and he did so, saying that as a representative of a newspaper which was concerned about its integrity, he felt he had to stay to fight for the Varsity's right to enter any area and print any story, and he concluded by saying he considered this principle more important than the rights of privacy of any individual student. It was at this point I moved that if Mr. Bettson was so callously indifferent to the rights and wishes of a student, the meeting should set aside the first item and go on to other business. This motion failed to gain the necessary two thirds majority and the meeting adjourned.

To the story as carried by the Varsity let me say this: the story quoted someone as saying Bettson was "calously indifferent to reason." No one made that accusation, though one could justifiably claim he was obstinately and stupidly indifferent to reason. The accusation I made was far more serious: Mr. Bettson was callously indifferent to the rights and wishes of a fellow student in a very important matter. Again, the story says the committee "voted to move in camera." There was no such motion and no such vote; in the face of the student's desire not to proceed with the appeal before a reporter, it would have been superfluous.

If the biased reporting manifest in this story is an example of the Varsity's integrity, then integrity is a much-abused word. But far more important, if Mr. Bettson's perverse unconcern for the rights and wishes of his fellow students is typical of the Varsity's views of its responsibilities, then the students who pay for it are a much-abused constituency.

Reform Senate, don't abolish it

I objected to your editorial Monday concerning the role of the Senate. While I certainly would agree that reform of this ossified body is in order, I do not think that its abolishment is wise. In your blurb you lost sight of the original role of the Upper House, which, while Canada consisted of the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, served to give these two regions of the country equal representation on a body having legislative control, to at least in theory prevent the interests of one region achieving total control to the detriment of the other. It strikes me that the Senate could play the role of representing the regional interests of all parts of the Dominion: The West has an equal block of seats as Ontario and Quebec, and the Maritimes slightly less. Surely this could be made to reduce provincial federal tensions if the Senate were revived, for with legislation passed in the Commons (representation by population) and by the Senate (in theory, "representation" by region) then one could truly say that one had national consensus.

It is obvious that what is needed is the abolishment of the practice of appointing people to the Senate, and the institution of an electoral process that would leave the major regions with equal numbers of seats but would allow for elections to senatorial ridings in each division, say one-third of the senators of each division being put up for re-election every four years, so as not to conflict with General Elections

No energy crisis at the John

Once upon a 1973 there was a Fortress, a new Fortress, proud and strong and free (at least it sounds good). It was the most up-to-date Fortress, they could buy for money was no object.

Now this fortress was built for a University where professional types abounded, including quite a few of species Energy Crisis Predictus. Thus the Fortress was built to conserve this intangible elixir.

And that was why when said Crisis appeared on the scene, and the Fortress was asked to cut unnecessary lighting, there was none to be found.

The moral of the story is that the Fortress bought cheap lighting, for in some areas almost half the tubes have burned out at the same time. But the most unusual thing is that unless you looked up, you wouldn't have noticed.

More wrath on grape issue

It was with interest and some concern that I read the letter by Chris Morgan and Dave Pelletier concerning the grape boycott at Burwash Hall.

While some commiseration is due to them, I feel the stand they take is blown a little out of proportion. It would seem that their complaint about grapes at Burwash is a veiled attack on the "right-wing" policies of the Canadian government and apathetic and callous students.

I do not understand why the fact that the Roman Catholic and United Churches and Mayor Crombie's support should influence anyone. Surely we should be allowed to form our own views, without conforming to those of Mayor Crombie or the Pope.

I also resent the implication that Canadian students are apathetic as students elsewhere are "in the forefront of progressive movements." We have seen many interested and socially conscious student groups on this campus and others, and while I do not agree with some of these groups, their presence is felt and noted.

As a final comment, the only VUSAC executives that I have seen eat grapes at Burwash Hall, were those at Mr. Morgan's table at the Christmas Dinner. Only when they were assured that the grapes weren't Californian did they eat them.

South African facts challenged

I would like to reply to the letter (January 9) of Professor Puritt and Ms. Hurlich. For the present I will just note that the letter called me a liar and will confine myself to replying to its "facts".

Puritt: "...the killing of 69 peaceful demonstrators in Sharpeville in 1959..." As a matter of record, the Sharpeville incident occurred in 1960. More importantly, the Sharpeville demonstrators were anything but peaceful. The police were harassed and at least one was seriously injured. Further, as at Kent State, those assigned to maintain public order were not the only ones doing the shooting. Perhaps Puritt would also like to provide figures on how many peace-loving innocents, Black and White, have been butchered by the "liberation" forces in Southern Africa, for purposes of comparison?

Puritt: "...the Blacks have been allocated one fifteenth of the most arid land in South Africa..." Actually 50 per cent of the arable land in South Africa is Bantu. In addition, productivity of Bantu land when compared to similar land farmed by other of South Africa's peoples is distressingly low. To put it bluntly, they can't use the land efficiently. To turn more farming land over to them would be to waste the land in much lower productivity. In a world desperate for every gram of food this would be exceedingly foolish.

In reply to Puritt's economic statistics I offer these:

In the years fiscal 1966-71 the purchasing power of the South African Bantu increased 60 per cent. It is estimated that by the end of this century the standard of living of non-White South Africans will have tripled, representing a rate of growth in economic well-being 50 per cent higher than that of White South Africans. Living standards for non-Whites are the highest of any non-White state. Asians in South Africa are among the wealthiest of their race in the world. Bantu there have the highest standard of living of any Black people on the African continents. The average per capita income of Black South Africans is $211/year, as compared to Ethiopia $60/year or Upper Volta $43/year.

Four-fifths of South Africa's Bantus 7-21 years of age can read; in the rest of Africa an optimistic figure for literacy is one person in five. A student attending one of South Africa's five non-White universities pays only $160 to $300 fees per year, while the government subsidizes those universities as much as $1,400 per student per year.

In recent years the South African government has built several new cities for Bantu, each able to house 100,000 or more people. The combined population of these cities is approximately one million persons.

At nominal cost to themselves, South African Bantu enjoy the best medical facilities on the African continent. There is one hospital for each 1,500 South Africans (all races) compared with one per 31,000 Nigerians and one per 65,000 in Ethiopia.

In fiscal 1971-72 $162,550,128 were spent on the further development of the Bantu homelands, and a further $57,170,000 were made available to activate Bantu Authorities. In the 1960's, $0.56 billion were spent on Bantu homelands development. Those semi-autonomous homelands, incidentally, have already surpassed 29 of the 42 African states in per capita income.

Last year tax revenue in South Africa was spent as follows: 49.1 per cent to education and social services, 19.2 per cent to economic services, 18.4 per cent to defence, 7.8 per cent to interest and redemption on loans, 4.9 per cent to general administration, and 0.6 per cent to tax collection.

The truth is easy enough to find if one wishes to seek it. The important question to ask ourselves when reading Puritt and his ilk is just what are they trying to accomplish? Are they truly interested in allowing the people of Canada to make up their own minds on the question of South Africa? Or are they really serving the interests of a hate-filled, power-hungry minority bent on destroying South Africa? (By the way professor, since when is dissenting political opinion, "nauseous propaganda"?)

City and borough response was almost the same, but at Metro it was the borough politicians' votes which ousted the islanders. South American mission will not include Chile

By DICK BROWN

Ontario's trade mission to South America in March will not include Chile, but the decision has nothing to do with any political move to boycott Chile's ruling military junta.

Instead, according to senior officials in the provincial department of industry and tourism, a group of businessmen representing eight to 10 Ontario companies will go to Columbia, Ecuador, Bolivia and Venezuela.

Despite consideration of Chile late last year by provincial officials, Chile was scratched from the list because the junta had expressed virtually no interest in having a trade mission from Ontario. Peru was also scratched from the list for the same reasons.

About 30 companies have inquired about the March mission, but no final decision will be made until the end of February, provincial ministry sources say.

The mission is specifically slated to be a "sales mission" in which Ontario firms will be trying to increase their sales in South America. No purchasing by Ontario firms is involved.

Deciding which South American countries to send a mission to involves senior provincial officials balancing off a number of factors, including:

- federal trade commission requirements sent out by Ottawa,
- which countries have loans from the Canadian International Development Agency,

- which countries have loans from the Inter-American Bank,
- whether the countries are interested in a trade mission from Ontario.

Last October's provincial trade mission to South Africa, which brought a storm of criticism in the provincial legislature from opposition members was quite successful, but no figures are yet available on how much money was made by the eight firms which went, according to officials.

"South Africa went very well. We were very pleased with the reception we got from the South Africans," one ministry official said.

Oil spill could be disastrous

By ROBIN THOMPSON

The consequences of an oil spill from the proposed Mackenzie Valley pipeline could prove fatal to the delicate Arctic tundra, U of T researchers are finding.

As part of the Arctic land use research program, a team from the Institute of Environmental Sciences and Engineering has been taking a long look at oil spills over the past two years, and hopes to keep working on it for another two years.

The team measures the spread of a slick and the effect it has on living things. They observe the flow of oil under snow cover. They also measure the rate at which different hydrocarbon components evaporate from exposed oil and how toxicity changes.

If a pipeline rupture were to occur, it would kill all the vegetation in the area. The biggest area to be effected would be west of the Mackenzie River. It is not known how long it would take to restore the sensitive Arctic tundra.

During the winter, since oil thickens with cold and is absorbed by snow, the contaminated area would be small. In the summer, it would spread through the extensive drainage system.

Donald Mackay, co-ordinator of the oil and gas working group in the institute maintains the group is working strictly on assumption and he sees no real crisis at hand.

"We know a lot more about oil now than we did two years ago," says Mackay. "I see an opportunity to do a lot of things providing the present effort is maintained."

Mackay believes the pipeline may be built sometime in the 1980's. The gasoline would extend from Prudhoe Bay to east of the Mackenzie delta, across the Mackenzie, and follow south to northern Alberta.

The pipeline would take natural gas from Alaska to provide the US and parts of Canada such as Toronto. Once this is accomplished, Mackay said, an oil pipeline would follow five years later.

Mackay emphasized the biggest danger to the Arctic lay in construction of the gas pipeline. Unpredictable local ruptures which would affect migration would be inevitable, he said.

Mackay stressed the greatest danger lay in the actual construction of the pipeline.

Pollution Probe, which disagrees with the policy of exporting Canadian natural gas to pay for the pipeline, will debate Mackay next month.

Group wants rights for psychiatric patients

By VALRITA FOURNIER

Police have the power to pick up an person from the streets whom they suspect of abnormal behaviour and detain him or her for 30 days in a mental institution.

A group of doctors, lawyers and other professionals is trying to do something about this.

Last year the Ontario government conceded mental patients, or those imprisoned in mental institutions, have a right to legal assistance.

On September 12, the Ministry of Health sent a letter to the Psychiatric Hospital Patients' Welfare Association (PHPWA) stating it approved a "project to involve twice monthly visits (of legal aid counselors), of approximately three-hour sessions in provincial psychiatric facilities."

The government has since then failed to act on its promises.

Facts of mental illness are startling. One out of every six Canadians will spend some part of his/her life in a mental institution, or clinic.

At present there are close to 75,000 persons being held in these institutions. A study done in May, 1967, revealed the physically sick received an average $31.00 per day worth of care, while the mentally sick received an average of only $7.00 per day, according to the PHPWA.

If police pick up anyone they suspect of abnormal behavior they can detain him/her in a hospital such as 999 Queen Street W., for 30 days.

Unless the patient has friends who can help from the outside, it is not likely the patient would ever get a lawyer to visit him/her.

The record of even a short stay in a mental institution can adversely affect prospects for employment or emigration as well as a landed immigrant's prospects for Canadian citizenship.

The PHPWA does not deny the realities of mental illness, but it does want to insure the fundamental rights and decencies of life, as well as the proper medical care to those who are mentally ill.

Don Weitz, a one-time mental patient who became a practicing psychologist, pointed out at Wednesday's meeting, there are a number of institutional "violences" practiced regularly against the mentally ill. The most notorious of these are psychosurgery and over-drugging.

Psychosurgery has been banned in some parts of the United States and the Soviet Union as inhumane, unnecessary and most often ineffectual.

Nevertheless the practice of removing part of a person's brain in order to control his/her behavior is still continued in Ontario, most often to the "aggressive" poor and to women, Weitz said.

He said overdrugging is the most widespread of malpractices in our mental institutions. Doctors excuse it by saying that a shortage of staff makes it necessary. Usually, however, the patient is drugged beyond what is necessary to make him manageable, so that most of the time he is in a zombie-like stupor.

Other abuses such as the invasion of a person's privacy, the withholding of legal and other information from the patient and his family, physical discomforts and forms of humiliation are numerous, the PHPWA says.

Women's jobs extend domestic roles

By HEATHER SANGUINS

According to 1965 statistics, the average female college graduate was 30 per cent cheaper for employers to hire than the average male elementary school graduate, U of T student Donna McCombs said Wednesday.

She suggested the 'professions' women have traditionally been encouraged to enter are extensions of the roles they have been forced to play inside the home.

From the mother-healer-babysitter role there is nursing and typing teaching; from the housewife role there is cooking and waitressing; from the sex object role there is modelling, air stewardessing and clerking.

McCombs, speaking at OCE in the lecture series on women pointed out clerical work was presented as an extension of the housewife role in texts used for vocational guidance in Ontario schools.

Published in the 1950s, two such books are "The Girl of the New Day" and "The Canadian Girl at Work: A Book of Vocational Guidance."

The speaker stated clerical work was comparatively highly paid until the 1940s and 1950s when women "flooded" into the field, which had formerly been dominated by men.

McCombs quoted statistics which showed in the decade after the first world war the number of nurses in the work force increased by 300 per cent. Other "suitable" professions which the government encouraged educated women to enter were social work and librarianship.

McCombs pointed out in a war economy, two of which have been experienced in Canada this century, the "sexual division of labour" broke down.

Consequently, women were allowed to pursue formerly exclusively male occupations.

After the war ended, in both cases, the situation changed. However, "Rosy the Riveter" would probably have found work as a secretary after the boys came home.

Sting: a slick reminder of Peter Pan

I understand that there are people who bundle up and venture out to the movies once or twice a year. This year, I recommend they go to The Sting, which is a movie that people who don't like movies like. Paul Newman and Robert Redford are reunited in this Sons of Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid. It is the tale of an elaborate confidence game played on an unscrupulous gangster, and it must be said that the plot unravels with nice virtuosity. As a glossy-finished, Hollywood "product", The Sting is a masterpiece.

But the mouldy calculation behind it got to me. The 1930's ambience is pervasive, with hardly a frame flickering by without a Fels Naptha poster or Ezra Brooks Bourbon billboard. And the film wallows in the implish, fraternity-boy connivance between Newman and Redford. The Sting has all the brummagem spirit of a pep rally.

Yet it climbs to the top of list after list of the Top Ten movies, compiled by those show-biz columnists who confuse movies with 45's and whose favorite movies are all westerns. This is depressing. Is this what these critics want movies to be? Do they keep going to movies only for The Sting, and Paper Moon, and Travels with My Aunt? Don't they realize that, despite all the charm and escapism of these movies that they are in the suburbs of cinema, as Agatha Christie and Arthur Hailey are in the suburbs of literature? For some reason film buffs have a vested interest in the assumption that film is entertainment, not art. Otherwise their games would be ludicrous, in which they name all the roles of Elisha Cook, Jr. or scour New Wave films for homages to Howard Hawks. Trash needs no apology, but neither does art.

The Sting winds up neat as a pin. For a few moments, it looks like the unspeakable has happened. A partial vacuum occurs in the theatre as several hundred viewers simultaneously suck in their breath. But no, everything comes up roses. I kept thinking of Peter Pan, when all the wide-eyed children in the audience are beseeched to wish with all their might because Tinker Bell is dying. The audience who filed out from The Sting, brimming over with rosy contentment, proves that the yearning for a world as obliging as Peter Pan's does not vanish with adolescence. But then I suppose a cynically happy movie is less objectionable than a cynically vicious one.

If I can't please everybody
I might as well not please nobody at all (but there's so many people and I just can't please them all)
—Bob Dylan

It wasn't unexpected. The out-of-town scores were in. The critics following his tour weren't pleased with Bob Dylan's performance. But many of the people who packed Maple Leaf Gardens last week nonetheless hoped for the rebirth of a leader, some revelation or direction, something more than just a glimpse of the man and the sound of familiar songs. They were disappointed: some because they expected more from Dylan than he ever intended to give, and others, because they didn't listen to what he was saying.

Bob Dylan keeps his mouth shut when he hasn't got anything to say.

Everyone was forgetting everything that Dylan had told them in all his years of songwriting. Dylan is the master of understatement. His lyrics work just below the level of conscious comprehension. And so it is with his concerts. It's most amazing that this man, a genius of a poet, could be treated in print like any other piece of show-business that comes to town.

Above all else, Dylan is a poet. He writes words that communicate his ideas. Dylan didn't say anything to the audience between songs last Wednesday night, save for a perfunctory 'thanks' when it was all over. He didn't speak in the concerts that preceded that one, and despite the criticism, I doubt that he'll say anything in the ones that follow.

It's not his style — for several reasons. The most important is that his lyrics contain his statements. They've been carefully constructed, and stand on their own. Speaking about them could only detract from them. Dylan realizes that people bow down to the explanations instead of the art. Then too, Dylan wants privacy and at the same time cultivates a sense of mystery. That's why he's given so few interviews in the last decade.

It struck me that many fans could feel communication on a one-to-one basis. Perhaps it's not that hard for an individual in the audience to empathize with the lean figure spotlighted on the stage. But the reverse is impossible. Dylan has always been fearful of crowds. To him the audience was probably just a mob.

The concert was arranged in a highly structured, symmetrical manner. In each half of the show Dylan was on at beginning and end, the Band playing alone in between. He sang in front of the Band except for the solo acoustic performance at the onset of the second half of the concert.

The first set was the longest, with six songs. Dylan began with "Rainy Day Women #12 and 35". He started on the second verse and never did complete any of the verses the way he originally wrote them. Instead he interchanged couplets from different verses, added some new ones, like "They stoned you when you're coming through the door / They'll stoned you when you're trying to start a war," and mumbled the lines he forgot. "Lay Lady Lay" was a bit of a shock because the tempo was up familiar tunes like "The Night They Drove Old Dixie Down", "Cripple Creek", a sparkling job of Dylan's "I Shall Be Released", "King Harvest" and one new song. The arrangements were precise, the musicianship a joy. The Band was obviously trying, playing extra hard for their friends and family in the audience. It was all a perfect foil for Dylan's opening.

Dylan came back on wearing his sunglasses, and seeming a bit more composed, ran through excellent rocked up versions of "All Along The Watchtower", (warning of the approaching apocalypse) and the 1963 song about the South Dakota farmer who killed his wife and five children, "The Ballad of Hollis Brown". He ended with his last successful single "Knockin' on Heaven's Door".

In the first half Dylan to be unfolding his musical identity — a real of the rock style of Highway 61 and Blonde on Blonde. The song was aimed at his own fail to understand. The ed with a song about p "stone you" and closed about the journalist why something is happening you don't know what it closing songs are more statements. The cataclysmic approaching and the Hollis incident is only one si madness. "Knocking on Door" is open to mu interpretation when view from the movie "Pat G Billy the Kid". Dylan take away his "badges" "guns". These are the s authority and leadership wants no part of. By "kn and the Band's backup was bouncy rather than mellow. Dylan used his raspy-throated singing style rather than the sonorous voice that highlighted the Nashville Skyline album. But that wasn't as jolting as the version of "It Ain't Me Babe". The tune and phrasing were altered and the "poppy" rock background made the tune sound like the Turtles more than Dylan.

It wasn't just a folk who s "you go way and I'll

There were three more tunes all from Highway 61 Revisited and each was played almost exactly the way it was recorded. Though no one seemed to notice, he only made it through "It Takes A Lot To Laugh, It Takes A Train To Cry" without a flaw. He dropped a verse (the second last one) in each of "Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues" and "Ballad of A Thin Man". By this time much of the audience was affected by Dylan's apparent lack of effort and what seemed to be a mechanical approach to his songs. In retrospect, I believe he was very frightened. The Band seemed to try and emphasize that point when Dylan left the stage. They began "Stage Fright", a song probably about Bob Dylan. Now deep in the heart of a lonely kid

*Suffering so much for what he did
They gave this plowboy his fortune and fame
Since that day he ain't been the same*

*See the man with the stage fright
Just standing up there giving all his might
And he got caught in the spotlight
But you get to the end you want to start all over the end*

The interlude with the Band was a pleasant journey through t god, ksinger aid, your go mine"

With a love that doesn't bend
And if there is eternity
I'll love you there again
In the other new song "Except You", Dylan says that "Nothin' matters to me and there's nothin'
I desire, except you".
Nothing anymore seems to please me except you Nothing hypnotizes me or holds me in its spell
Everything runs by me like water from the well
Everybody wants my attention.
Everybody's got something to sell except you
I'm still in love with you.

And when the audience seemed to think that they understood this new Bob Dylan, rooted firmly in simplicity, he launched into a stunning performance of "It's Alright Ma (I'm Only Bleeding)". bitting off the images and spitting them out at the crowd. It was a triumphant moment.

The final set of the evening, made up of three songs, began with a prayer to a child (one of his own?) called "Forever Young".
May you grow up to be righteous
May you grow up to be true
Now you always know the truth
And see the light surrounding you
May you always be courageous Stand up right and stand up strong

May you stay, forever young
The last of the new songs
"Something There Is About You" seemed to tie together his past and present.
Something there is about you
That sparks a match in me
Is it the way you ran loose
Or is it the way your hair blows free
Now is it because you remind me of something there that used to be Something there is about you
That brings back the long forgotten truth

With the penultimate number,
Dylan established a relationship between the concert segments.
An excellently performed "Like A Rolling Stone" completed the circle of songs.

The songs will differ slightly from concert to concert but the more important ones will probably appear in every city.

The encore left no doubt about Dylan's apostasy.
I'm just gonna let you pass
Yes, and I'll go at last
Then time will tell who tell
And who's been left behind,
When you go your way and I go mine.

Dylan at the Gardens: mumbled verses, but the punch is still there

Conductor has rare malady but no mush

Solti Chicago Showcase
Georg Solti, Chicago Symphony Orchestra
London CS8800

As I remarked in a previous review,
Georg Solti seems to have that rare conductor's malady—he has an incurable desire to record almost everything in the repertoire. From complete Wagner operas to Beethoven symphonies, nothing escapes the gaze of this musical giant, who by all accounts is at the peak of his powers.

Solti has long recorded on London (26 years) and bears the honour of being the first man to complete the LP recording of Wagner's "Ring" cycle of operas, a project, which when embarked on in the late '50's, had an "it-simply-can't-be-done" status in everyone's books. Since then, Karajan (DG) and Bohm (Philips) have produced the same music, showing Solti to be a real trailblazer in this respect. But anyone who compares his work of that era with the recordings he is presently turning out will notice a drastic change in style. Not that the degree of skill involved was substantially less in those days (Solti has never been unskilled in anybody's book), but his conducting was marked with an Ozawastyle penchant for the spectacular that has been replaced recently with a new lyricism and sensitivity.

Solti is one of the busiest conductors in the world, being the leader both of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, one of the continent's finest, and the Vienna philharmonic, one of Europe's finest, on a level of competition with Karajan's Berlin Philharmonic. He is also an opera fan, but most of his work is presently inside the studio.

Recent recordings have covered almost all the Wagner canon, as well as Mozart and others. For his services as chief conductor at Convent Garden in London, Anne Phillips' Mum gave him the royal sword-tapping, so he's now
Sir Georg.

The present recording is a sampler of what Solti has done with Chicago in the past while. The makeup of the disc is a nice change from the usual run-of-the-mill greatest hits collection (which almost always gives us bits and pieces of larger works, or short pieces one after another). Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan" leads off side one, in a thrilling performance. This orchestra can play!
No fatigued horn passages, no mushy string work. No wonder Solti is so fond of the group. Wagner's "Meistersinger" overture (a work that is familiar to almost everyone) follows, giving us a taste of Solti's prowess with the music of that Bavarian megalomaniac. The performance is straightforward and unstinting, but a little weak in the middle section, perhaps indicating that this performance came from Solti's "Sturm und Drang" period. I may be totally, hilariously wrong though. The dates of recording aren't given on the jacket notes.

Side two opens with Rossini's Barber of Seville overture, and follows up with Beethoven's Egmont and Leonore No. 3 overtures, totalling up over 55 minutes of music on a very fine greatest-hits collection, the finest to come my way in a long time. The music is rock-bottom basic stuff for anyone's collection, so if you lack good performances of this music (particularly the "Don Juan") toddle right out and get it. London's sonics are (as usual) alive in the highs, but solid and heavy in the bass. Just the thing to liven up the speakers on yer ole Seabreeze portables. You snobs with fancy gear will just have to turn the bass control down a shade

The lights came up for the intermission and presented an interesting panorama of the kinds of people who were drawn to the Dylan occasion. There were women with peroxide hair, and Persian lamb coats, who probably waved good-bye to menopause years ago. Sixteen year old boys in denim jackets chewing gum with a passion, and a smattering of grandfatherly, grey-haired gentlemen wearing ties. But most of the Gardens was filled with fans with 20 to 35 birthdays behind them, who grew up with Dylan in the '60s.

Dylan came back on alone, with an acoustic guitar and his harmonica fastened in a holder around his neck. "Just Like A Woman" was almost bleated out.
There was no vocal control and he seemed to be searching up the wrong alley for most of the notes. He did recover his equilibrium on "Girl Of The North Country" though. The theme of romanticism was established and the audience was prepared for the first two of the four new songs that were unveiled. Both were simple love songs (probably for his wife Sarah), so personal and so passionate in their assertions as to be almost embarrassing.
Unlike most of his previous works, the lyrics are sparse on images. The first was called "I Love You More Than Ever".
I love you more than ever
More than time and more than love

I love you more than money
And more than the stars above
My thoughts of you don't ever rest

You can kill me if I lie
I'd sacrifice the world for you
And watch my senses die
You turn the tide on me each day
And teach my eyes to see
Just being next to you
Is a natural thing for me.
And I could never let you go
No matter what goes on Cause I love you more than ever
Now that the past is gone.

Again Dylan denied his leadership.

It's never been my duty
To remake the world at large
Nor is it my intention
To sound the battle charge Cause I love you more than all of that

A tap dancer, who can tap—but not dance, a violinist who plays like he sings—badly, an artist who does pastel psychic portraits of your soul, together with tea leaf-readers, and Tarot card predictors, make up the carnival the Theatre Passe Muraille is perpetrating under the title The Toronto Pixie Caper. As a fellow reviewer remarked as we waited for something to happen, "It should have been called, 'Everything you always wanted to do to a paying audience but were afraid to try.'"

This is the kind of "production" that makes you wish they'd tear down the Trinity Square building now instead of waiting two weeks.

Of course, if you're in a good mood (it would have to be a very good mood indeed) you might find the Toronto Pixie Caper a kind of in-joke. Or you might consider the whole thing an accurate and ironic statement on "Theatre" in general, especially the con-artist style carnival.

It reminded me of the old neighbourhood garage theatre we used to have where our underlying philosophy was "Let's put up a few booths, get John to do a card trick, charge 10 cents per parent and get enough money to go buy a couple of chocolate bars and soda pop". Only we did it much better, and all the parents were well aware that behind our glittering bedsheet curtain was nothing more than a bunch of sweet-tooth little brats out for a fast dime.

The Theatre Passe Muraille's Carnival will cost you considerably more, $2.50 to $3.50, for considerably less. I went to the Sunday matinee "performance". Had it not been a pay-what-you-can "performance", I would have subtitled the Toronto Pixie Caper, The Theatre Passe Muraille Rip-Off.

bad news

Good News is on its way to Broadway, and, hopefully, by the time it arrives, the news will be much better. The show eased into the O'Keefe Tuesday night and will be resting there till January 26, when it leaves for New York by way of Washington, Philadelphia, and Detroit.

Good News is a dusted off and beated up version of the 1927 Broadway hit of the same name. Producer Harry Rigby hopes to place this little number in his collection of theatrical memorabilia - a collection which includes Irene and No, No Naniette.

If you like 30 year old jokes, a little bit of vaudeville (there's even a dog act), songs like "Button up your Overcoat," or "The Best Things in Life are Free" or "Lucky in Love" or Alice Faye or John Payne, then this is the show for you. Rigby revived Miss Faye and Mr. Payne for this show - barely. Miss Faye, is of course, as charming as the thirties in which the show takes place - only she's thirty years older. She plays Prof. Kenyon, the astronomy professor who offers to give the captain of the football team one last chance to pass her astronomy exam, so that he might be allowed to lead good ole' Talt College to victory in the "Big Game." Got the story line yet? Complicate (somehow the word is out of place in this show) the story with Pi Beta Phi females and pipe-smoking football heroes and a June Allyson type character and you've got it. Everything your love and college life should be - sugar-coated and easy to take. If you go to the show - take your insulin.

There's nothing wrong with Alice Faye - she's on stage so little it kind of makes you wonder if her role will survive as far as New York. John Payne is fine too - you can't hear him and he's always upstaged anyway - not a difficult thing to do. John Payne could be upstaged by dust. Stubby Kaye is Stubby Kaye. Stubby Kaye looks like humpty-dumpty which is kind of fun to keep in mind while he sings "Keep Your Sunny Side Up."

The real credit for this cotton-candy fluff-ball belongs to Barbara Lail as a perky, man-handling co-ed, who manages - at times it seems against incredible odds - to ignite real fire under her fellow chorus - cum - students. Had it not been for her energy and continual drive, the Varsity Drag number might have been just that.

Miss Lail, together with Tommy Breslin (the Freshie), and whoever the two male chorus members were who did a superb tap-jazz number, all deserve a round of applause for reviving this revival.

They together with Donald Brooks "everything you always wanted to wear, but could never afford" costumes, Donald Censlager's delightful set (he also did the original in 1927) and Tharon Musser's lighting, just may have some good news by the time they get to New York. In Toronto, the news isn't so great and lines like, "Oh, Tom, one fumble doesn't make a bumble," certainly don't help.

tee vee ticklers

Every Thursday midnight, CBC provides some English mirth for those wretched souls with no Friday morning classes. While the second show, Father, Dear Father, (appearing at 12:30) has remained for over two years, the preceding time slot has been filled by the naughty Up Pompeii, the niggardly Alcock and Gander, and presently by the incomparable Monty Python's Flying Circus.

The 'Circus' consists of a number of rather lengthy skits interspersed with short cartoon reliefs. This past Thursday, one memorable sketch entailed the talk show, "Is There" in which, following the customary introduction to the three, open-mouthed, demised discussants, the question of the week was advanced - Is there an afterlife? - and subsequent to interviews with each successive stiff, it was proclaimed, "There, you've heard it first on 'Is There', there is no afterlife". Forthwith, attendants appeared and proceeded to drag away the carcasses.

Father, Dear Father is a comedy of errors revolving about a divorced, bungling, adventure-writer and his two lovely daughters. Naturally, most of the comedy involves the generation gap and the lack of efficient communication, but these are all the more greatly amplified by Patrick Glover's maladroitness. Incidentally, Patrick Cargill, who plays as Father, also portrayed the police inspector in that outrageously obtuse film, Help.

Both shows guarantee at least one outburst of uncontrollable laughter, so you are hereby advised to forewarn your sleep-destinated parents or roommates of some rare noises emanating from your TV room. In any event, turn off the set or change the channel at one o'clock, else you'll be heading for a head-on collision with NightCap, and News Blues.

TV breakdown blues

David Freeman could only go so far writing about the frustrations of life as one of society's physically disabled "creeps". Perhaps the next logical step was to write about so-called normal people who are just as "creepy" in their own way. Certainly there are a lot of crippled people in You're Gonna Be Alright Jamie Boy, Freeman's third play now playing at the Tarragon Theatre. But as in the first two plays Freeman seems compelled to structure the work around a victim character (or characters) whose handicap is a direct result of outside repression.

The victim in this case is Jamie just released from the Clarke Institute after a nervous breakdown. The tyrant figure is his father who fears homosexual tendencies in his son and is constantly trying to marry him off so that he can produce children (not just one but many) and thereby establish the father as a patriarch. Another minor victim along the way is Jamie's sister Carol who married a meat-headed television vegetable just to escape the horrors of home and who decides to abort her first child rather than continue her hockey-night-in-Canada marriage. It takes the whole first half of the play before these aspects of family night at home become evident. Act I therefore works beautifully as a well-contrived situation comedy with carefully timed entrances, trivial but hilarious surprises (the priceless cigar-store "knick-knack" and plenty of artfully banal one-liners that define this T.V. Guide family as a carbon copy of the programmes which mesmerize them. But given the situations, the neuroses and the conflicts which manifest themselves in the second half (have potato chips ever been used so violently?), the sit-com, mock TV style breaks down.

What it breaks down into is not quite clear. Are we supposed to get the feeling that someone is rapidly switching stations on us, from comedy to soap opera, to Divorce Court to a toughened up re-play of David French's Leaving Home? If so the send-up is not strong enough and I suspect not intentional. No one style sustains itself. The spoof plays what it is mocking and the play becomes an aggressive but murky mingling of Long Day's Journey Into Night and the Archie Bunker world of All In The Family.

In spite of all this, however, it refuses to fail. Freeman is a talented writer and that carries the stylistic problems a long way. The setting, as always at the Tarragon, is a perfect vehicle for the work in progress and in this case the "Honest Ed's Special" decor keeps us in tune with the original concept of the play. The acting is also hard to fault. David Ferry and Jayne Eastwood as the tormented brother and sister play out their melodramatic traumas with surprising credibility. Lillian Lewis is consistently subversive in a mild-mannered portrait of Harriet Nelson gone to seed. Stuart Gillard gives a well-oiled characterization of a TV boob and Hugh Webster is frighteningly oblivious, if totally unsympathetic, in his one-dimensional

Trelawny delights

It's finally happened! An evening of sheer delightful theatre—beautiful to the eye, pleasing to the ear and rippling with easy laughter, sentiment, warmth and a happy ending that reconciles the love of two people and the love of the theatre. The play is Arthur Pinero's Victorian comedy Trelawny of the Wells, playing at the St. Lawrence Centre under the direction of Leon Major.

At first glance Murray Lauder's elegant, old-fashioned stage design, complete with footlights, proscenium arch, and gold tassled drop curtain with its romantic centre picture brings to mind Toronto's one period piece theatre, the Royal Alexandra. And yet the obvious artifice of its reconstructed authenticity in this modern, stream-lined theatre interlocks with the play. Because this is a play about theatre people (starring Rose Trelawny of Sadler's Wells) it constantly moves out beyond the stage which contains it, exploring the difference between the nineteenth century stage and our own but capturing the sameness of the "gypsy" folk who change its definition. This bi-local vision is beautifully perfected as the set of the first three scenes (our play) becomes the Pantheon Theatre for the last scene and the actors set about producing their play.

As well as being an artfully constructed theatrical work in itself, Trelawny is a play about theatrics. It uses the postures, gestures and gags of sentimental comedy and allows us to enjoy all the manipulations of the stage, of characterization and of plot even as we are swept up and captured by them. Each clever characterization is imbued with some special quirk of foible making the part not only readily identifiable but in this case readily endearing—Claude Bede as the stuffy Sir William Gower who edges his way into the theatre world through a recollection of the great Edmund Kean, Richard Monette as Tom Wrench, the struggling playwright who finally gets to produce his strangely true-to-life comedy, Gerard Parks as James Teller, with his wonderful Dickensian W.C. Fields Master of Ceremonies speech at the farewell dinner party for Rose Trelawny, Denise Fergusson as the never-say-die friend and stage troupier Avenia Bunn, and of course Domini Blythe as Rose Trelawny, the darling of Sadler's Wells who leaves the stage to marry a "swell", only to run from the boredom of the aristocratic Growers in Cavendish Square back to the "real" world which she loves, changed, refined, but still stage-struck. The delight of this play is that the other world follows her. Both they and we are smitten by the magic of the theatre. And watching a play like this it finally becomes clear why one is lured back to its charms, through dreary, boring and disappointing performances until once again a sparkling gem of production reminds us of what it's really all about.

role. But when all is said and done, when the last TV dinner tray has been overturned, the last potato chip mashed into the floor and the last beer bottle uncapped, it is hard to know what to feel. Laughing at these people is one thing, sympathizing with them is another. Situation comedies operate as an escape mechanism but the reverse psychology of You're Gonna Be Alright Jamie Boy makes it hard to feel anything for these people except a wish to escape from them.

Royal sounds from jobless soundster

In 1921 the young Swiss-French composer Arthur Honegger needed money and a name. So when he got an offer to write incidental music to a play about King David, he snapped it up. Not since Mozart had the venal art of whipping up a masterpiece to order been so successfully practised. Later Honegger expanded the music, originally for small orchestra, into an oratorio, "Le Roi David", for mixed chorus, soloists, narrator, woodwind, brass, strings, piano, harmonium, and assorted percussion.

The Toronto Symphony and the Mendelssohn Choir under Elmer Isler presented this unwieldy creature Tuesday and Wednesday, and will do so again tonight. "Le Roi David" is made up of 27 episodes, the psalms as text, for orchestra, orchestra and chorus, soloists or narrator, and bits of narration about David's rise and fall, in between. So it's no mean feat to keep it all together, let alone make it go beyond the story and add up to a musical event. And in my opinion, the thing was brought off.

Split second timing helped glue the narrator's parts to the orchestral and choral interludes so that a real sense of drama was created. Colin Fox, the revved-up narrator, would cue in over the dying echoes of the forgoing interlude as if not to lose a moment in the telling of this Ultra-Story, this bombshell biography of The Man (I am pounding my type-writer now) who is (says the Olivier over-kill in Mr. Fox's voice) Then, Now and Forever!

But that's all right. I am laughing at the melodrama, the gauche trill of drama in Mr. Fox's voice, even at the Hollywood flashes of orientalism in the score, but I like it all the same. Even if I can't bracket out the smaltz, I am fascinated by the baroque blending of cinematic frenzy and musical lyricism. Here is a refined version of Spartacus, Mahler with Old Testament zeal.

Riki Turofsky turned in her usual able performance and Seth McCoy and Gabrielle Lavigne were fine. It's the choir, as always, that we admire. Just when you think they've reached the zenith of vocal barn-storming, up they go a couple of decibels, and with the evenness of tone of amplified electronic music. Until you hear this choir you will not know how well Honegger has re-written Handel's unison choruses.

Final performance is tonight at 8:30 at Massey Hall. You don't miss anything, except the presumably anguished facial expressions of Mr. Fox, by opting for the third-tier seats. You usually lose your aural perspective down in the plush seats, but for this piece you lose it up in the rafters too (for less money) and that's the only way to enjoy it.

Oh no! Not another Carmen disc

Bizet: Carmen Suite, Feux d'Enfants,
 L'Arlesienne Suite No. 1
 Daniel Barenboim, Orchestre de Paris
 Angel

If you're at all familiar with the recording scene today, think hard: what piece do we really need a new recording of? Rossini's string sonatas? no, there are far too many of those around. Beethoven's Lieder? Haydn Quartets? C'mon, you're not trying! What we really need is a new recording of Bizet's Carmen Suite!

Well, if the rather heavy-handed sarcasm hasn't penetrated yet, I'll be simple—we aren't in dire need of another version of this popular work. Still, as is usually the case with the classical "warhorses", if the performance is a good one, there's always reason to find room for it on the record racks. This disc comes hot on the heels of Bernstein's new recording of the complete opera.

I'll bet that the themes of the suite are lying about in your brain, even if you're sure you've never heard the work. "The March of the Toreadors", the "Habanera", all the gypsy/spanish music is subliminally familiar to nearly everyone from radio and TV. The suite highlights these themes, and is a chance for the orchestra to show off.

"Jeux D'Enfants" may not be as familiar. It's Bizet's impression of the child's world, much in the same manner as Debussy's "Children's Corner Suite", composed much later. The sections (marked "marche", "Berceuse", "im-promptu", "duo", and "Galop") were originally piano pieces, but were later orchestrated by the composer.

Side two is the Arlesienne Suite No. 1, a work of great melody and driving pulse, especially in the Carillon section, another work which is subliminally familiar. Considering that Bizet died at the age of 37 and only fully completed a few of his projects, the amount of melodies he left is truly astounding. Some people simply cannot tolerate Carmen, but few will deny the fresh staying power of its melodies. It, its suite, and the Arlesienne are simply phenomenal in their ability to remain enjoyable today.

A word should be said now about the performances. Every conductor worth his salt has had a crack at these pieces on vinyl, so Barenboim is up against some pretty stiff competition. Nevertheless, he comes through quite well, hampered only a little by the Orchestre de Paris, a good ensemble but not yet a great one. All that this recording really needed was the presence of a top-notch group to make it to the top of the heap. Aside from this, it's quite an acceptable recording, well engineered and pressed. Now that all Angel releases are coming up through the States, the quality seems to have gone up considerably.

Schubert marred only by content

Schubert: Duets
 Janet Baker, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau and Gerald Moore (piano)
 Deutsche Grammophon

Schubert Lieder fans will be familiar with the name Fischer-Dieskau, he of the complete-works fame. So far, he is the only singer ever to attempt (let alone complete) the task of recording virtually every Schubert song. The 29 records that hold the 500-odd songs represent a mammoth musical achievement. All that said, what could remain for the super-Schubertian to record?

Janet Baker has teamed up on disc before with Fischer-Dieskau and Gerald Moore (everybody's favorite conductor) on Angel, but this is their first appearance on DG together. The works are titled as Duets, but only in odd sections do they actually sing together. Discounting a set of inconsequential Vocalises (warm-up exercises) which start side two, they perform several neglected works, many of them "scenes" for two voices. One, from Goethe's "Faust" is of particular interest, and sets one wondering what Schubert's dramatic gifts would have given us if he had ventured deeply into the world of opera.

"Hector's Farewell" (text by Schiller) and "Cronan" are two more scenes, the former taken from Homer. All through the album, the singers' total professionalism and love for Schubert shine through, making it a rewarding experience for the die-hard Lieder nut. Make no mistake about it, though, this is not a disc for beginners. Even seasoned song fans may find it unspcakably dull in places, but I don't see this as the performer's fault, unless they deliberately neglected true duets in favour of so many "scenes". Baker and F-D are two world-class vocalists, and it's a delight to hear them sing simultaneously. Was there no music which could have shown off their dual talents together?

If you'd like to hear Lieder that isn't obscure, try Fischer-Dieskau's recording of the Schubert song-cycles (related groups of songs), "Schöne Mullerin", "Winterreise" and "Schwanengesang". These are the most famous songs, and will repay close attention. As for the present disc, it is expertly performed, but spoiled just a bit by the choice of music. db Yehuda Menuhin at 16. He's older now.

Menuhin fiddles the bouncy '30s

Jalousie: Music of the Thirties
Yehudi Menuhin, Stephane Grappelli, violins,
Alan Clare Trio
Angel SFO - 36968

Okay, I'm willing to give this one a try. After all, isn't Menuhin a weird type, recording guitar and sitar duets with Ravi Shankar? And now jazz with one of the best jazz fiddlers in the business? All kidding aside, the remarkable Dr. Menuhin has done it again. He's taken the most unlikely combination possible and made a joyous, bouncy album of pop songs from the '30s, arranged in the best Cabaret-style decadent manner.

Mind you, he had a little help: Stephane Grappelli, an almost legendary figure in the world of jazz (though far from inactive—he is on the run between the Paris Hilton and Ronnie Scott's club almost constantly) who made a name for himself in a series of discs with all-time great Django Reinhardt and the Hot Club of France. There are some precedents here: guitarist Reinhardt and Grappelli made numerous transcriptions of Bach for small jazz combo, and now Menuhin rounds out the picture by bringing his formidable talents as violinist and all-around musician to the recording studio with Grappelli.

The tunes run the gamut from Gershwin ("Love is Here to Stay") to Cole Porter ("Night and Day") to four tunes Grappelli composed the night before the record was cut in a flurry of activity. Mostly, it's old standard stuff, the tunes most musicians know by heart and tiredly grind out at weddings, wakes and bar mitzvahs. But Menuhin has not been grinding them out, and Grappelli has never played a tune the same way twice, so the result of the get-together is happy, inventive soloing from two masters of the fiddle. As you might expect, Menuhin doesn't have the improvisational skill of Grappelli, of whom he says, "He is like a wonderful juggler who throws plates and pots into the air and miraculously catches them again." He's no dummy, though, and his solos would be enough to satisfy all but the hardest of the hard-core jazz fans. What makes up for his lack of experience in the field is his magnificent singing tone, the tone that has captured millions since his first stage appearance at the age of 12 or so.

Some may find the tunes a little on the schmaltzy side, but the music can't escape the era it was written in, nor the prevailing climate of the popular song of the day. These two old masters simply give us an enjoyable, light record's worth of fun.

No schmaltz in this guitar work

The Christopher Parkening Album
Christopher Parkening, guitar
Angel S - 38069

Guitar buffs will surely know that Christopher Parkening is in the front rank of classical guitarists today, and this is confirmed by no less an authority than the grand master of the instrument, Segovia. "He is one of the most brilliant guitarists in the world." This album, so the liner notes relate, celebrates his fifth anniversary on Angel records. Let's be a little more sensible, since large music corporations aren't in the habit of giving artists elaborate birthday presents. This is simply a greatest-hits album, made up from the young California-born guitarist's previous four discs.

But what a greatest hits collection this is! If you don't have any classical guitar in your collection, then I can recommend this as highly as a Segovia record (the two even go well together). The music is a collection of standards: Bach (Jesu, Joy of man's Desiring, the first prelude from Book I of the Well-Tempered Clavier, and so on), Albeniz, Tarrega, and other Spanish composers, and the famous A. Non, one of the most prolific of all musicians, seemingly active for close to 500 years, something of a record.

Parkening's sound has none of the harsh edge that some guitarists have come to favour, especially in the more flamboyant works. His technique is one of subtlety, marked by an intelligent use of rubato. No schmaltzing around thank you very much. The choice of music must have been difficult for whoever set up the record, seeing as his previous four discs have been top sellers. It's a lovely work, just the thing to take the paranoiac edge off mind at the end of a night of essaying or hitting the books.

My review copy was marred by an excessively scratched surface and a great deal of static, even the trusty old Lencoclean failed to wipe off. If your copy sounds like it has been sent through the wrong end of a paper shredder, don't hesitate to send it back. Also included with the disc is a large poster of our boy, complete with large, moody eyes and appealing pose. Grab this one, all you sloppy-hearted romantics.

Weepy dirges mar Nichol's new release

Dave Nichol
Columbia; $6.29

Nichol had a fair amount of success with the single "Goodbye Mama" by falling back upon that old chestnut of the record industry, the leaving home theme. I could name at least 10 or 11 recent releases, by Canadian singers alone, that used the same idea, but Nichol has certainly come up with the worst one. Having had to listen to a dreary and sobbing first out, on a debut album yet, one can either throw the record out or continue listening, in the hope that there will be improvements.

Unfortunately, "Goodbye Mama" is the high point of the LP and the listener is forced to suffer through nine over-orchestrated tear-jerkers which are further enhanced by expressionless vocals. If Neil Young is the best known moaner and whiner around, then Nichol should rate as the best weeper this country has ever had. He would be rich if he'd move to Nashville and specialize in singing those barroom confession tunes.

Dave Nichol would starve to death as a professional mourner so the best thing he can do, for us and for himself, is to give it all up and go away.

Workers' control: an answer to anti-labour unions and anti-labour bosses "Workers' control" — whether viewed as a mere slogan or as a concrete perspective — has recently become one of the most debated political issues.

To a large extent this has been a result of the escalation of workers' struggles throughout the capitalist and socialist world. France in 1968, Czechoslovakia in 1968/69, Italy since 1969, Poland in 1971, and Quebec in 1972, were all high points of an international cycle of struggles in which workers fought for more autonomy from their capitalist and communist bosses. More recently the long and widely publicized struggle of the LIP watch factory in Besançon, France, has provided a concrete point of reference for workers' control enthusiasts.

At another level, the debate has received a great deal of publicity from the work of leftist social scientists in search of alternatives to the prevailing capitalist organization of work.

The result has been a great deal of confusion, with concepts such as workers' control, workers' self-management, workers' participation often used interchangeably.

The value of this Workers' Control Reader is that it helps to clear up much of this confusion. It does so by combining theoretical analyses of the workplace with contributions based on concrete experiences.

The editors also make an effort to introduce clear-cut distinctions between reformist approaches and radical ones. They succeed in part, thanks to the contributions of prominent marxists such as André Gorz, Ernest Mandel, and Stanley Aronowitz. Though focussing on different aspects of the subject, these authors stress the anti-capitalist essence of workers' control, and remind peaceful-transition fans of the centrality of class struggle in any strategy for workers' control.

Not equally successful is the attempt of one of the editors, John Case, to further clarify matters along these lines. His essay — which partly reflects the views of the other two editors — is perhaps the most politically important contribution of the whole collection, for it tries to assess the extent of a workers' control movement in North America, and proposes some lines of action for a "realistic" strategy — not an easy task indeed!

Changed labour force

Case is very aware of the transformations which have occurred in the composition of the labour force over the last few decades; therefore he points out that workers' control as a strategy must transcend traditional blue-collar sectors and be extended to all work situations.

However, one hardly gets the impression that Case's enlarged perspective is based on an understanding of the all-encompassing character of capital's domination. Rather, it results from a mechanical application of the libertarian ideal of "self-government" to the realm of the workplace. This ideal becomes "workers' self-management", and the route to pursue it is workers' control. That this route involves constant struggle, Case admits; but it sounds more like a concession to impatient radicals than a primary focus of strategy.

But what about capital's demonstrated capability to counter working-class attacks, to divide and routinize them, and to turn them into enlightened managerial innovations?

And even more important, what about capital's ability to move the ground of struggle from the factory to society at large — from the shop floor to the grocery-store counter? How can one talk of workers' self-management without taking all of this into account?

Co-option

Moreover, what Case and other contributors to this Reader seem to miss is the ability that capitalism has to turn traditional working class organizations into sophisticated tools with which to 'manage' workers' struggles. This is a severe limitation, and it becomes evident in Case's effort to assess the role of unions in the struggle for workers' control. His conclusion that "workers' control demands may arise both inside and outside unions" (p. 465) sounds more like a matter of choice for militants; it hardly denotes an awareness of the role of union organizations as guarantors of workers' discipline and capitalist productivity.

This is where the essay by Aronowitz helps to straighten things out. His conclusions are based on a penetrating critique of trade unionism in its American version, and on a careful analysis of the pattern of workers' militancy which has emerged in the 1960s and the 1970s. Much of what he says applies equally to Canada, in so far as he is not concerned with the problem of "good" or "bad" union leadership, but with the "institutional constraints of trade unionism itself" under advanced capitalism. "Trade unions," he argues "have become an appendage of the corporations because they have taken their place as a vital institution in the corporate capitalist complex."

Anti-labour unions

To make Aronowitz's point concrete one need only look around. The historic no-strike agreement negotiated last year by the steelworkers union provides the most blatant example of organized labour's complicity in insuring corporate profits by selling out the workers' interests.

Closer to us, the recent railway strike provides another key illustration of unions playing the inflationary-deflationary boss' game at the expense of their workers' basic needs, and in the process suffocating the widespread militancy and initiative of which CNR rank-and-filers had proved capable. The statement made on that occasion by a CNR worker, that "unions are an extension of management", may be a hard pill to swallow for most trade-unionists and their supporters, but it reflects the growing awareness of an increasing number of industrial workers.

Any struggle for workers' control, therefore, is not likely to be initiated by trade unions, but will have to be generated by rank-and-file movements who in seeking new instruments of struggle will find in the unions one of the main bulwarks of opposition. This is the conclusion at which Aronowitz arrives — a conclusion which today must become a starting point.

These clarifications, as essential as they are, do not go far enough. The very notion of workers' control, and some of the historical and political assumptions on which it has rested for decades, are in need of critical questioning.

For example, the idea of workers' control would have seemed quite logical to a skilled worker around the turn of the century. In that phase of capitalism the central place that skilled workers had in the process of production gave them a high degree of control over the organization of work; it made the project of the seizure and management of production look both possible and strategic. In fact in Italy and in Germany this was proved.

Today try to tell an assembly-line worker (or even an office worker) that he or she could gain control of the factory and be involved in managing production! Forget it entirely if this worker happens to be a recent immigrant who does not even speak the language, or a woman who has another job — housework — waiting for her at home!

The present epoch of mass production and mass labour power has had the effect of detaching and uprooting the worker from the means of production to an unprecedented degree in capitalist history. And this is true not just of blue collar workers but of white collar workers as well, and even of intellectual workers. Students who have entered the labour market recently have learned this the hard way.

Refusal to work

Where the industrial working class has showed its strength in these past decades of capitalism has been not in its ability to seek control of capitalist plants and offices and manage them, but rather in its attacks on capitalist productivity, through wildcats, sit-ins, plant occupations, widespread absenteeism — all forms of struggle which have undermined the workers' sense of identity as producers of capitalist profits and exploitation along with it.

And of course — as always — the first to catch on with these new trends in workers' consciousness have been the more enlightened sectors of the capitalist establishment. The recent report on work commissioned by the US Health, Education, and Welfare department could not make it clearer: If capitalism has to avert a major and imminent productivity crisis, it must re-vitalize a "producer ethics and consciousness" among the working class. This would involve changing the organization of production so as to give the worker a "higher" degree of control over his workplace. A sort of "managed" self-management where productivity increases, exploitation intensifies, and everybody is supposedly happy!

From the workers' standpoint, this historical transformation is seen differently. As a FIAT worker put it during a recent plant occupation: "This occupation is different from the one workers did in 1920. In 1920 they said let's occupy, but let's work. Let's show everybody that we can run production ourselves. Things are different today. In our occupation the factory is a starting point for the revolutionary organization of workers — not a place to work! (Radical America, March-April 1973, p. 31)

Unless these fundamental changes in capitalist strategy and in workers' mass consciousness are taken into account and are made operative as class perspectives, workers' control will remain relegated to the realm of pure debate, with little relevance to the workers' struggle itself.

Circumstances and awe have so far kept us from writing about The Emigrants and The New Land but they are tremendous films. So it was gratifying to see The Emigrants (returned to the Revue for a three day run) sold out Saturday night. While The New Land can stand on its own, it's like starting Lessing, Durrell or Tolkien in the middle. Hopefully some theatre will cotton to this and bring The Emigrants back before The New Land finishes its run at the International Cinema. The earlier film will be shown next weekend at St. Mike's, although, for this film, you might want to double-bill of vintage Bergman at best and worst: The Magician and The Virgin Spring. Wednesday through Friday, Wedding in White and La Vraie Nature de Bernadette.

Pick of the week: Tuesday night at SMC, The King of Marvin Garden, a box-office flop but a fine film with Bruce Dern and Jack Nicholson. In the Five Easy Pieces, Drive, He Said mode. And, Monday at Ontario College of Art, Kurasawa's classic, Rashomon.

Lest we forget: Sunday afternoon at Cinematek, The End of August at the Hotel Ozone. "Eight savage young women, raised in the barren aftermath of a final world war follow their matron leader as she seeks a sire for the human race". Free to members. When will they bring back Wee Geordie?

wait for a more comfortable theatre. It is nearly three hours long.

Meanwhile The Exorcist continues to pack the University Theatre which, from all accounts, should be smelling a little rank by now. There was a rumour in the media last week that Warners would cut the scene of the twelve-year-old rearing her vagina with a crucifix, but Warners vehemently denies it. A principled stand, to be sure. A friend suggested that this was one film worth phoning the morality squad about (the case would be moral but the reason would be aesthetic), thus perhaps tying up some of the picture's immense profits. However, for our part, we've just decided to skip the movie.

Anyway we endured our share of gore at El Topo, about which we disagree totally with our reviewer (see inside). We thought it was equally bloody and pretentious which is very bloody and pretentious indeed. Jodorowsky will be in Toronto next week and Cinecity is looking for an appropriate spot for a press conference. We suggest Canada Packers.

Good news from Cinematek: prices are being lowered to $1.50 single admission and $10 for ten tickets. They also sent an apology to everyone on their mailing list for the micro-version of Les Enfants du Paradis shown in December. Sample Revue fare: Saturday, La Strada; Sunday, Spartacus; Monday, A Place in the Sun; Tuesday, Shadows.

Meanwhile, the Revue brings back The Harder They Come this weekend, a Jamaican film that feels truly Jamaican—that is, a non-American style film, which makes it a very rare bird Monday and Tuesday the Revue offers a David Amram is a kind of twentieth century renaissance man of music. He's a former composer-in-residence of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, has guest conducted with the Toronto Symphony, composed nine triple concerts for full orchestra and jazz quintet and even written an opera of "Twelfth Night". The list of accomplishments not only grows longer and larger but more diverse. For instance, the forty-odd year old Amram composed the scores for the movies, Splendour in the Grass and The Manchurian Candidate, and already published his autobiography in 1968 (called Vibration). Amram seems to thrive on diversity. He's a great believer in removing the restrictions caused by musical categorizations and to that end he makes use of all musical forms so that there are "no more walls" (which is the title of his first LP). David Amram is at the Riverboat, 131 Yorkville tonight through Sunday and he should provide a great musical experience. Fraser and DeBolt open on Tuesday. Admission is $3.50.

Fiddler's Green, behind the Y on Eglinton, east of Yonge (489-3001) features the homegrown sound of Jack Schechman tonight. On Tuesday, Glen Udow, who plays piano, guitar and banjo, gets into ragtime and blues. Admission is $1.00.

Open Circle Theatre is putting on something called 99c Pollock this Friday

(the 18th) and Saturday. It costs (of course) 99 cents. Friday will feature poet Milton Acorn, Cedric Smith and the Perth County Conspiracy, singer Fergus Hambleton, the String Band, etc etc. Starts at 9 and runs till midnight (maybe later). 103 Bellvue Ave. Two blocks west of Spadina off College.

Coffee and cakes will be served at a cost.

There's plenty on this week at the Edward Johnson Building: tonight at 8:15 guitarist John Herbert gives a recital in the Concert Hall, no tickets required. Further on in the week, Gayle Hennick does the honours on piano (Monday 8:15 pm). The School of Opera puts on its production of Mozart's Don Giovanni on Wednesday, Friday, Saturday and Monday (Jan. 23, 25, 26, 28) and all you lucky students can get in for $1.50 (bring your ATL). Thursday evening spotlights works by students in the composition course of the faculty, performed by some of the leading students, and there's no ticket involved here either. Who says music has to be expensive?

It's worth thinking about the record business in this town for a minute. If you go to the record stores that make up the downtown area, you'll observe that prices have simply gone crazy. There appears to be no sense in any of the prices.

Theatre Passe Muraille's grande finale at 11 Trinity Square, The Toronto Pixie Caper, is apparently a low-keyed Carnival assemblage. If you're interested in having your tea-cup or your Tarot read and like mini-theatre both acts drop by for this final statement and take it as seriously or as lightly as you wish.

Following the decision of the Local Initiative Programmé not to renew its grant to Le Théâtre du P'tit Bonheur (our only French language theatre) two scheduled productions Qui a peur de Virginia Woolf and Aujourd'hui Peut-être have been cancelled. Two one-act plays L'amant by Harold Pinter and Joulez-moi d'amour by Jean Barbeau go up January 31. Neil Simon's serio-comic play The Gingerbread Lady, produced by the Menagerie Players, is currently in performance at the Central Library Theatre. The Actors' Theatre have loaded their second show of the season Death of a Salesman with a strong cast. It's now playing at the Palmerston (Avenue) Library Theatre and we'll have more comment on that masterpiece play next week.

On campus a stripped-down, roughed-up and de-romanticized version of Ibsen's epic drama Peer Gynt commands attention on the Hart House stage until January 26. Using the dynamic music of modern Scandinavian composer Saevold, director Frederick Marker builds his interpretation of the play against a stark, abstract set where actor/spectators seated on bleachers bear witness to Peer Gynt's strange journey.

Of interest to the stage-struck and pen-bent, the Toronto Centre for the Arts has announced its sponsorship of the Playwrights Production Company—a workshop for directors, actors and playwrights working with new scripts. Directors wishing to direct, playwrights wishing to have readings of their plays and actors interested in experimental work may call Catherine Logan, Toronto Centre for the Arts, at 967-6969. Sounds like a bard's dream! That's it but don't miss Trelawny of the Wells, by the way.

The winner of last week's review contest is Ulli Diemer, the only entrant and, indeed, seemingly the only person to realize that an implied contest was being sponsored. He spotted the obscure reference in the Norman Vincent Peale article that said "And now, audience, for our next contestant. He's Mr. Eddie P. Rec. Thebes. He's had a little falling-out with his parents and some eye trouble. We'll help him find abundant success right after this word."

Mr. Diemer wrote in to point out that the reference was to Oedipus Rex, and that it was intended to point out, in a humorous, subtle manner, without rhetoric or moralizing, that many problems are social, incapable of being solved with individualistic panaceas that leave the social roots of misery untouched. Our congratulations to Mr. Diemer, who wins as his prize a copy of Mao's Little Red Book.

SUNDAY EVENINGS
UPPER CANADA COLLEGE

TRANSPORTATION PROVIDED FREE

All University of Toronto students and staff who would like an evening of pleasure skating are invited to be at Devonshire Place (beside Varsity Stadium) at about 7:20 p.m. on Sunday. Buses will leave at 7:30 for Upper Canada College, returning to the campus shortly after 10:00 p.m. These arrangements will continue for the following five Sundays: January 20, 27, February 3, 10, and 17. No charge is involved.

What Next?

Who Are We?

Systems Design is an interdisciplinary department at Waterloo which offers graduate (M.A.Sc. & Ph.D.) as well as undergraduate (B.A.Sc.) programmes. Our graduate students come to us with first degrees in such areas as Engineering, Mathematics, Computer Science, Economics, Architecture, Geography and Psychology.

What Are We Doing?

The faculty and students in Systems Design at Waterloo are working together on important and challenging projects in Systems Theory, Modelling and Simulation; Ergonomics and Human Systems Engineering; Computer Graphics, Computer-Aided Design and Computer-Assisted Instruction; Conflict Analysis, Communications; Optimization; Stability Theory.

Further Information Available

Financial assistance is available and we admit students in January and May as well as September. We can send you a detailed 30 page brochure on the various full and part-time Systems Design Graduate Programmes.

Toronto badminton players emerged victorious from the Ryerson Invitational Tourney held over the weekend, with the Women's trophy and the combined trophy. RMC took the Men's top award. In the women's singles, U of T placed first and third, Leilah Edroos and Mary Lou McGraw taking the honors. A Queen's girl placed second. In the women's doubles, Toronto took first and second places with the teams of Janet Onions/Mary Fournier and Leilah Edroos/Mary Lou McGraw. For the men, Geff Mills came fourth in the singles. Lane Bishop and James Osi placed first in the doubles. Toronto also sewed things up in the mixed category, which is not included in the combined trophy or in the tallying of points. Bishop and Onions took first place, with Blair Faulkner and Fournier in second.

The U of T women's basketball team won two games out of three in the Ottawa Invitational Tournament. The Hamilton Brackets managed to defeat the team 46-30, with the top scorers Chris Crawford (7), Trish Beck (5), Pat Tatham (16), and Anne Hurley (12). In their game with Queen's, Toronto squeezed through with a final score of 39-37. Chris Crawford again made it into the top scorers, racking up 20 points for the team. She was followed by K. Keely (14), Terry Knight (6), and L. Marshall (8). MacMaster fell to the Toronto girls to the tune of 58-37. Topscorers were Crawford (13), Knight (12), Ann Bowen (9) and Penny Goodsell (9). In an exhibition game on January 15, Toronto lost to Gueph by a close 34-28. Pam Wedd lead the scorers with 14 points followed by Les McIntosh with 9 points. Chris Crawford, Karen Edgar, Anne Williams, Martha Williams each sank two shots and Diana Zukauskas hit one to round out Toronto's scoring.

Erindale beat PHE 4-1 in women's hockey by Yanch and Shinbole. MacDonald replied for PHE.

St. Mike's B edged UC - Music 2-1 on goals by Yanch and Shinbole. Scoring for the UC - Music coalition was MacLagan.

In women's volleyball, most of the opening games were lost by default. Dents defaulted to Meds III, St. Mike's defaulted to PHE I, PHE II defaulted to Food Sciences, Music defaulted to New III. However some games actually were played. UC beat Eng 9-15, 15-8, 15-11. Meds toppled Trin 15-6, 11-10. Pharm I lost to Erin 15-12, 15-6.

The mayor's task force, under the direction of Pamela Cluff, has recommended the construction of a major sports and recreation complex to be used only by handicapped people.

The Ryerson wrestling powerhouse under coach Pat Bolger trounced the combined Toronto-York team. The final score was a resounding 20-8 in favor of Ryerson.

Blues blast RMC 10-1

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

In a four point game at Varsity Wednesday, the Blues mauled the Royal Military College Redmen 10-1.

Blues seemed to have recovered completely from last Friday's sluggish performance against Carleton and scored almost at will against the RMC team.

The well-disciplined but badly out-matched cadets were simply no match for the powerful Blues who scored four goals in first period, three in the second, and three more in the third for their runaway win.

All was not happy in the winner's dressing room though, as coach Tom Watt complained bitterly of Larry Regan's refereeing, calling it "arrogant".

In the opening period Toronto almost scored immediately when Kent Ruhnke and Chuck Luksa nearly beat RMC goalie Amos on passouts from team-mates.

Not to be denied, Blues finally broke through at 4:02 with RMC's Gord Brown off for interference. Doug Herridge faked a defenceman and then set up Ron Harris who rocketed a shot into the right hand corner. Ivan MacFarlane assisted.

A minute and half later, the Blues cashed the cadet's goaltender again. Taking a crisp lead pass from Luksa, Ruhnke used Don Pagnutti as a decoy and snapped in a shot at 5:33.

At 9:44, crafty veteran Brent Swanick tip-toed in on the right side and banked in a shot from what is popularly known as an "impossible angle". Herridge assisted on the completion of this mission impossible.

After the ten minute mark, the play began to grind as RMC went in a defensive shell. Blues tried to ignite their explosive offense again with long passes to their fast-breaking forwards but RMC's checking tactics usually stopped them between the blue lines.

But with only 28 seconds left in the period, Blues made it 4-0 when MacFarlane tipped in a shot by Harris.

In the second period, the Blues continued to molest the RMC netminder, despite the Redmen's defensive efforts. First Gord Davies, then Bill Fifield, Al Milnes and Ruhnke were stymied by Amos on saves that were designed to exercise the spectator's vocal chords.

Inevitably though, Blues broke through again when RMC was penalized at the 13 minute mark. Watt sent out Harris, Milnes, Herridge, MacFarlane and Luksa on the power play.

They passed the puck around with the expertise of the Russians, and finally, with the RMC penalty-killing unit in chaos, Milnes neatly slid a pass through the goal mouth for Harris to tip in.

At 18:08 Davies added another goal after a faceoff in the RMC end. Fifield nudged the puck by several players to Davies who took a shot from 20 feet out that seemed to change directions, fooling Amos completely.

MacFarlane made it 7-0 with only eight seconds left in the period. Swanick fed him a lead pass and MacFarlane rifled a slapshot into the net from just inside the blueline.

The Varsity—Dave Lavender

At 6:22 of the last period, Bill Hews scored unassisted on a long sleepy slapshot from the right side. It was a weak goal and even Hews shook his head in disbelief as he skated back to centre ice.

Another Toronto passing play clicked at 9:46. Pagnutti and Luksa set up Luksa who sped in and picked an undefended corner of the net.

Ruhnke, having a fine night, made it 10-1 Varsity with Lauder and Pagnutti assisting at 15-12.

Blues' goalie Robert Oss lost his second consecutive shutout with only 38 seconds remaining. A Blues' defensive miscue in their own end allowed cadet defenceman Brian Hook to intercept the puck and then walk in to score from about 25 feet out.

By period, Toronto outshot RMC

19-9, 18-6, 17-6 for a total of 57-21.

Coach Watt was so incensed by the refereeing that for the first time in years he made a complaint on 'the game sheet'.

"The referee was deliberately trying to keep the game close," fumed Watt. "Look at this - only 14 assists on 10 goals. That's ridiculous."

"Players like Ruhnke and Pagnutti are in the scoring race and they need the points," said Watt. "After all, what's going to happen when York plays them with their leading scorer?"

On the game report Watt also complained that Regan had made derogatory remarks to his players. He concluded his written comments, saying "We don't want to see him back again."

Since the RMC players were standing around in groups waiting to get on their rickety old army bus, we asked them what they thought about the game.

"Well," said Doug Stanley, "we were outclassed. But what can you expect when we're only a college of 600?"

"We did all right last year in the QUAA," mused Marc Ouellet. "We tied Loyola and beat Sir George Williams but they're too good in this league. We hope they'll bring in that two tier system."

What did they think of the refereeing?

"Oh, that's the best we've seen," said RMC's assistant coach. "No, we have no complaints."

Toronto's next game is this Friday at 8 p.m. They clash with third place Queen's in Varsity arena.

Fitness test offered free

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Fitness tests ordinarily cost at least $25 but all you have to do to get one free is drag your body over to room 107 in Hart House and sign up.

"We felt there was a need for more programs for students," said Joe Rabel who is running the fitness tests. "We wanted to motivate people to get more exercise but we feel the fitness clubs pay more attention to their physical fitness. A lot of commercial clubs have sprung up but they're not doing a very good job. Most people just aren't motivated to stay at it. These clubs also cost a lot and the information they give isn't always very scientific."

Under the direction of Rabel, experienced and well qualified phys ed students will conduct the tests. Jim Shaw and Sandy Henderson are both doing graduate work in phys ed and although Greg Ross is still an undergraduate, he has had wide experience in fitness testing.

The first part of the test is a simple 12 minute exercise on a cycling machine. Your heart won't be working much harder than 130-160 beats which will barely work up a sweat, according to Rabel. The test works, however, because there is a linear relationship between your heart rate and the work load.

The second part of the test measures the percentage of body fat. It is done with skin fold calipers and only takes a few seconds.

The tests are done from 4-5 pm every weekday, except on Thursdays, when they begin at 3 pm.

After the test is done, the phys ed students can help advise you on the type of activity and body weight you'd be best suited for. Then, after a few weeks of exercise and possibly diet, you retake the test to see how much you've improved.

These fitness tests are open to both men and women. If you're interested, sign up now because they're already booked solid for the next two weeks.

Snow Bowl

A Snow Bowl between Mulock Cup champions Phys Ed and a team of interfac football all-stars is slated to take place February 1. The Snow Bowl is part of the plans for a winter carnival which will also include a pub night, the Blues-Loyola hockey game and several other activities. The arrangements are being done by the intramural sports committee and a group of fourth year phys ed students.

Jim Shaw checks a student's heart-rate:

Discipline negotiations stalemated

By MARINA STRAUSS

Negotiations between students and the university administration over the code of behaviour ground to a stalemate last week with one student saying the university had "double-crossed" students.

The impasse was reached late in the week after student representatives rejected the administration's latest proposal. That proposal would, in effect, allow certain sections of the code to be implemented.

The proposal, made by Governing Council's executive committee Wednesday to be presented as a motion to council's Thursday meeting, stipulates if "substantial progress" is made towards reaching consensus by March, then those sections agreed upon would be implemented, and the remaining parts would not be touched upon until January, 1975.

But, as Victoria College SAC rep Rick Gregory pointed out in an interview: "This does not recognize the assumption upon which we were working."

It is the Governing Council which will have the final say on what it considers "substantial progress", he stressed.

This, Gregory continued, ignores students' insistence that "the Governing Council cannot implement something to which students object."

Gregory, who has been involved in the negotiations, feels the administration "double-crossed" students.

He explained last Monday that internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway had assured student negotiators she would recommend to the executive council's meeting the following day that most of the academic sections and a few minor non-academic sections should be passed in the March Governing Council meeting if students agreed to those parts.

In addition, Conway said she would push for the abolition of the university's present disciplinary body consisting of faculty deans and college principals but containing no students.

"Conway said she had the support of (university president) Dr. John (Evans)," Gregory asserted. "It turned out that was incorrect—she didn't have the support of Dr. John."

"You seem to make progress with people you're talking with," he noted, "and then they turn their face around."

"It's time we talk directly with the executive committee," Gregory added.

Student governors Howie Levitt and Gord Barnes plan to propose an amendment to the executive committee's motion at Thursday's Council meeting stipulating "consensus is essential and the Caput must be abolished," Barnes indicated.

"We're not optimistic that the council will accept this," Barnes said. "They're not prepared to give us veto power."

Barnes, another student negotiator, stressed the objectionable part of the executive motion is the committee's "refusal to define the word 'substantial'."

"There is a definite split between the U of T Faculty Association (UTFA) and students," he explained.

"We won't agree to any code in which sections on lawful order and disruption are to be included," Barnes noted.

Students fear the Governing Council will allow such sections to be passed in March.

In a meeting with student negotiators and UTFA president Bill Nelson before last Tuesday's executive meeting, Nelson insisted his association would not accept any code which did not deal with disruptions, Barnes said.

"From our point of view, student consent to any such move is essential," Barnes pointed. "Nelson feels it's desirable but not essential."

Student representatives from SAC,

Howie Levitt has an amendment that demands student consensus

Why all the fuss? "Conway has no power," says Howie Levitt

SAC pres Anderson spent last week negotiating on discipline.

President Evans faces a clash between SAC and the faculty.

U of T squeezes all it can

Those wily little gnomes at Simcoe Hall are a shrewd bunch of second-guessers when it comes to money from Queen's Park.

With final enrolment figures long since settled, U of T is receiving $91,053,310 for the St. George campus from the provincial government after budgeting for a grant $379,877 less than that figure last February.

February's proposed 1973-74 budget included the $91 million figure as part of the total projected university income of $115,041,118, but also provided for a $809,759 deficit for the downtown campus.

However, that official budget runs contrary to a confidential document by president John Evans put together in November which lists a total income for the St. George Campus in 1973-74 of $116 million and a deficit for the year of $565,000.

Neither the official February budget nor the confidential November document from Evans' office indicate the reason for a $242,000 discrepancy in 1973-74 budgets listing of deficit.

The vast majority of provincial grants to the university are based on university enrolment and a scheme involving Basic Income Units (BIU's).

Each student is assigned a certain value which is translated to a given number of BIU's. Based on the total number of BIU's assigned, the university receives a grant of a set amount per BIU. After adjustments of a few hundred thousand dollars here and there, the province calculates its final grant.

The money U of T is receiving for the 1973-74 year is based on the 1972-73 enrolment figures which were made final December 1, 1972.

The actual computation of the figures is the sort of thing which keeps bookkeepers out of unemployment.

This year U of T is eligible for 56,421.9 BIU's, according to the provincial colleges and universities ministry. The fractional BIU figure is due to the calculation of part-time students into an equivalent full-time student figure.

Multiply those BIU's by the 1973-74 value for a BIU, $1825, and the grant starts at $102,969,967. The province then subtracts what it calculates for student fees called formula fees, or for 1973-74: $15,451,582.

That gives $87,518,385, but it doesn't stop there.

The province then adds a few goodies, including $78,000 for the school of social work; $695,000 for the Faculty of Education; $479,975 for various professional schools on campus; $1.2 million for a fee deficiency grant; and $1,081,950 (in 24 payments, no less) from assorted municipal tax monies.

All of that comes to the magic figure of $91,053,310. Wonders from Queen's Park.

By ANDREW FAUDY

Student Governor Howard Levitt has accused academic affairs committee chairman John Dove of stalling on a motion to include student membership on search and selection committees that was first brought up in December.

Levitt told The Varsity yesterday "there is no question he's deliberately keeping it off the agenda."

"His (Dove's) vice-chairman didn't even know the motion exists," Levitt charged.

Dove denies that there has been any deliberate delay.

THE varsity TORONTO

Committee 'stalling' alleged

"We have other business on our schedule that has been waiting for a few months," he said.

"This is the third meeting a row that it has not been on the agenda," Levitt grumbled.

He sees the delay as part of a tactical play.

"It would be easy to extend that principle to rejecting the concept of having students on search and selection committees for senior academic and non-academic appointments," he added.

The question of student membership on search and selection committees already has a long and involved history.

Governing Council's November meeting agreed to seat alumni representatives on these committees, but an amendment to include students was defeated.

The proposal was "that in those areas of the university in which it is not current practice, the inclusion of student representatives on search and selection committees for senior academic appointments, including departmental chairmen, and senior non-academic appointments be encouraged."

The matter was raised again at the executive committee meeting December 11 before being passed on to academic affairs

Alberta jobs may be a gas

The Canadian government is trying to recruit U of T students to do summer work at the Alberta location where American chemical-biological warfare (CBW) is, in part, developed.

The Suffield defence research establishment, near Ralston, Alberta, was the site of numerous American CBW developments including some used by the US in the Vietnam war.

The Defence Research Board, a branch of Canada's Department of National Defence, is looking for students to fill at least a dozen positions for the summer.

One job is "to participate under direction in a study of the acute toxicological response to a number of materials."

"The study will observe nutritional, biochemical, physiological and histological dose related responses with the aim of determining the safe dose that can be tolerated."

The government, however, is not sending a recruiter to campus but instead is letting U of T officials handle the recruiting process. Government contact is by mail only.

Agreement imminent on Innis co-op housing

By DICK BROWN

Innis College is close to a compromise agreement on a lease with U of T to set up Innis' co-operative housing in the Huron-Sussex area, according to Innis principal Peter Russell.

Innis had proposed a 10-year lease with an option to renew for a total of 25 years, but U of T balked and proposed a five-year lease instead.

In an interview yesterday, Russell said he is hopeful a compromise might be reached which would allow Innis to have the 10 houses until 1980, at which time the whole notion of the co-operative residence will be up for review by the university and Innis.

If such an agreement were approved by Governing Council on Thursday and also approved by the housing co-op, renovation work on the houses could begin by summer. "I've set July 1 as my personal target date," Russell said of the renovation work. "And I'd be damned disappointed if it started later than that."

The terms of the lease have been the main stumbling block recently in getting the co-op off the ground.

U of T owns the land and must lease it to the non-profit corporation which Innis is setting up to run the co-op. That arrangement allows the co-op to be eligible for federal funding from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation (CMHC) for renovating the houses.

Last month, the executive committee of governing council refused to approve the 10-year lease because the university would lose control of the property to "outsiders."

The co-op is to be controlled by its tenants, will be Innis students and area residents.

Russell and the co-op balked at the idea for a five-year lease, and negotiations between Innis and the university began.

Once a lease is approved, Russell said Innis will be applying to CMHC for the renovation money very quickly.

An early estimate of $250,000 to renovate the houses Russell termed a "maximum figure." He said he hoped architects retained by Innis could reduce that figure.

The renovation work proposed by Innis with the CMHC mortgage will probably include repairs on five houses which Toronto's housing standards department ordered last summer.

The housing standards work order was issued to the university in July, and only some of the repairs have been done. The university has not completed, some major repairs according to residents.

Russell was not overly concerned Innis would have to do the repairs the university was ordered to complete last year.

"There's really little point to have the university fix the plaster now when we'll be having the same plaster ripped out in a few months," he said.

Russell said the Innis renovation would be much more extensive than the repairs ordered by city hall. The ten houses—8 to 24 Sussex Ave. and 375 Huron St.—are to be fixed up to accommodate student and family housing, the family housing for area residents.

The Innis plan is to have two-thirds student and one-third area residents living in the co-op housing.

The possible compromise of the Innis lease with a review clause in 1980 reflects the general uncertainty surrounding the future of the northwest campus in the next decade.

During the 1960's when money for expansion of educational institutions was pouring into universities throughout Ontario, U of T set its sights on the northwest campus—bounded by St. George Street, Sussex Ave., viewed from the John, site of Innis residence co-op.

Bloor Street, Spadina Avenue and Harbord Street—as the next area for university expansion.

Those pipe dreams went up in a cloud of smoke when Queen's Park cut off money for further construction in the 1970's. The Innis co-op housing project is only proceeding because of the availability of federal funds for non-profit community housing.

U of T, however, has not given up on the idea of future expansion into the northwest campus. President John Evans has said on numerous occasions the northwest campus will be the major area for university expansion in the 1980's.

Therein lies the crunch on the Innis lease. The university wants to keep its options open for development in the northwest campus in the 1980's, and Innis, according to Russell, wants the security of knowing it has the time to get its new project off the ground and operating.

No to Vic students

Faculty and administrators have combined to defeat Victoria University's student requests for more access to the Board of Regents.

Victoria University Students' Administrative Council (VUSAC) was asking for six students on the 43-member Board of Regents. However, faculty received the six seats, while students were held to four.

VUSAC president Brian Gazely reiterated the student union's position for the second time in the past four months.

Gazely pointed out the three other federated United church-related colleges in Canada had parity representation with faculty on the top decision-making board.

According to information received by VUSAC from the various United-church related colleges across the country, two colleges had staff-student parity, and one college had more students than faculty.

Gazely said the University of Winnipeg had four students and four faculty on a 34-member governing body, while Mount Allison University had six students and six faculty on a 60 member body.

Huntington University, however, had four students and six faculty placed on a 24 member body.

Vic alumni faculty and administrators were oblivious to Gazely's low-key presentation and factual arguments but listened anyway for about five minutes.

The new structure was then pushed through. No students can presently vote on the Board of Regents. No oppositions were recorded, although a few board members abstained.

The new structure will likely take effect when a new Victoria University Act comes into effect. The new act will be worked on over a three year period with implementation expected in 1977.

Although Gazely thanked the Board for their "offer of four seats" he indicated that the students' council was not satisfied with the proposed structure.

Victoria president Goldwin French has reacted to John Evans' centralism.

Vic defines terms

The clash expected between the University of Toronto and the federated universities began to take form last week as Victoria University president Goldwin French defined the necessary college safeguards for affiliation with the U of T.

French reported to the Vic Board of Regents on his recent negotiations with the U of T administration over John Evans' new proposal for closer federated university-U of T links.

French's objectives were five fold:

- to remain as a federated college and not as a constituent college,
- to maintain faculty cohesion,
- to maintain faculty security; any changes that were made had to receive faculty consent,
- to secure leverage "to go on doing what we can," and getting what we can,
- to allow elbow room to exert effective influence on the adaptation that's going to take place.

French also insisted that the federated university preserve the right to appoint faculty members, the right to retain disposition of what the faculty teaches, when it teaches, how, etc.

French indicated that "a special drafting group was working with me. One of our sources for hesitation is highly centralized structures. It's exceedingly difficult between the difficult groups and the administration."

Victoria University principal J.H. Robson maintained that it was necessary to keep "power over the academic part of the budget, and other aspects of the Board of Regents. We should preserve a meaningful role for the college council."

French said negotiations would continue but said the longer discussions and uncertainty go on the more faculty morale will be affected.

Boycotted Kraft's profits fall

WINNIPEG (CUP) — Despite a noticeable increase in Kraftco advertising, the multi-national corporation suffered a net loss of 3.3 per cent in 1971-72 compared to a gain of nine to 15 per cent among its competitors.

Don Kossick, National co-ordinator of the National Farmers Union boycott of Kraft attributes the loss to the boycott.

In a speech to the National Farmers Union convention in early December, Kossick attributed the success of the boycott to the grass roots support from the union's members and the urban support groups that have launched an extensive campaign to spread the boycott.

The boycott was called on August 19, 1971 after representatives of Kraft refused to discuss the principle of a negotiating process for milk prices with the NFU.

The aim of the boycott is to have Kraft meet with the NFU to discuss procedures which would give dairy farmers effective collective bargaining rights through the NFU.

"As we have certainly come to realize, Kraftco is one of the largest food marketing corporations in the world. From its near monopoly position Kraft controls the price both to the consumer and the producer. In fact, Kraft represents almost every aspect of the multi-national corporation that is responsible for rising food prices to the consumer, while at the other end, putting the squeeze on the farmer," Kossick charged.

"I believe the boycott has exerted an effective influence against the gigantic marketing and advertising strength at Kraft's command.

Kossick added, "in a unique way, the boycott has shown the general public there is no recognition of the farmers' right to bargain collectively with those he supplies his product to. The consumers are at the mercy of the food corporations too. They must accept the price listed on the product and the quality of that product without question.

"It is recognition of their mutual exploitation that has resulted in people donating their time in spreading the word about the boycott, being involved in informational picketing actions at retail stores and actively working on the ruban boycott committees. These people have represented a truly broad based grouping of unionists, housewives, students, cooperative and community group representatives.

It is heartening to see that the boycott has become an alliance of so many interests."

The boycott has been publicly endorsed by over 130 organizations such as the Canadian Union of Public Employees, United Farm workers, Student Christian Movement, the federal NDP and the national union of students.

The Manitoba government responded to public pressure by cancelling negotiation with Kraft for the joint development of a $15 million vegetable oil processing plant. In B.C., the provincial minister of health stated publicly he was prepared to remove Kraft from all provincial institutions under him.

"Kraftco has certainly felt the effects of the boycott," Kossick concluded. "At one time they figured on us not being able to pursue the boycott for an extended period of time, but to quote Financial Times, 'Kraftco has a problem that time - as it once might have hoped - may not cure.'"

Discipline negotiations fruitless

Negotiations between students on the discipline steering committee and the administration will probably continue for part of this week. However, we don't feel these negotiations will lead to anything substantive judging by the administration's pussy-footing attitude of the past week.

Last week's student negotiators included SAC president Bob Anderson, student governors Howard Levitt and Gord Barnes, GSU president Cliff Watson, and APUS representative Dusan Milovanovic. Nothing significant was decided and we might have expected as much.

Internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway initially tried to bargain with the students according to Anderson. Conway apparently at first offered to have the administration drop any sections of the code that students couldn't agree to, and even then, she said, the code would not be approved without the "consensus" of the students.

The Caput was also supposed to be terminated, and Conway suggested at one point that only the academic section of the discipline code be implemented.

However, faculty association president Bill Nelson said the faculty would refuse to accept a code that permitted the abolition of the Caput without a new discipline code dealing with student demonstrations (the infamous "unduly obstruct" clause).

At this point negotiations bogged down and the administration began to backpeddle. Conway went from a "liberal" interpretation of discipline in mid-week to an almost "hard-line conservative" position by the end of the week. She appears to have been little more than the stalking horse for President Evans on the one hand and the faculty association on the other.

Evans refused to back Conway's verbal commitments, offering no concessions or promises to students.

Evans gave some indication that the academic code alone could quite possibly be implemented according to Anderson, but the president refused to commit himself until he knew which way the wind was blowing.

The negotiators asked Evans and Conway for a firm commitment that the discipline code wouldn't be implemented unless it was accepted by students, but this time both administrators refused to give any assurances at all.

By this point a significant number of students at this university must realize that the administration is merely toying with students with its constant promises and 'about-faces'.

If the administration continues to play cat-and-mouse negotiation games with students we feel a significant part of the student body will demonstrate their feelings to the administration. The Governing Council meeting Thursday might present just such an opportunity.

Hector case should be openly investigated

The Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) organization is presently waging a campaign that reveals one reason why students should sit on academic staffing committees.

The SDS campaign against racism has been accelerating since September and this week the organization, along with others, will present a petition to the Governing Council at its Thursday meeting demanding the resignation of U of T professor R. Ian Hector.

The SDS has produced a considerable amount of material on the 'Hector' question since the beginning of the academic year and we can only agree that there should be an open investigation of this man's teaching practices.

The SDS is presently circulating an "anti-racist code". One of its three demands is that "a committee be formed to investigate any charges of racism brought against any member of the university. This committee should be a parity committee of faculty, students and non-academic staff. Charges of racism shall be quickly investigated through public hearings held by this committee."

We agree with the spirit of the SDS "code". The university is supposed to be the highest form of educational institution in our society. It should not serve as a refuge for dangerous racist propaganda — statements and teachings which have no basis in fact or logic.

The campaign against R. Ian Hector is one example of the breakdown of the university's attempts to promote openness.

In one piece of material which the SDS is distributing a report by R. Ian Hector concerning an injured Italian worker is evaluated by a University of Kansas psychologist. The report states in part: "The report (Hector's) reflects a surprising and curious admixture of medical findings and social judgements reflecting Dr. Hector's personal biases as well as psychiatric inferences from the evidence which he presented. It is regrettable that a careful physician, such as the physical examination report suggests, should have permitted his attitudes towards a cultural minority to shift his position from medical examiner to social judge."

"From the evidence presented by Dr. Hector, there was no basis for concluding occupational skills, or predisposition to psychiatric disability other than Dr. Hector's personal bias."

I regretfully conclude that I found a tone of hostility and prejudice toward the patient's nationality in Dr. Hector's report which seemed to result in punitive recommendations for disposition of the patient's claims that are not based upon psychiatric principles of treatment, but rather upon Dr. Hector's personal feelings about the patient's cultural origins and the social problems presented by the larger ethnic group to which the patient belongs."

The SDS also points out that Hector's influence extends to this university where he lectures second year medical students in psychiatry. Also Hector is still psychiatrist-in-chief at Wellesley Hospital even though recently-appointed Workman's Compensation Board WCB chairman Michael Starr fired him from the WCB. Starr admitted the demands of the Committee for Just Compensation were legitimate, and has said he will move to end suspicions that the board discriminated against immigrants.

However, Starr had the WCB break contract with Hector. As Starr said: "I have spent my whole life fighting to stamp out discrimination. Suffice it to say that I am not in agreement with the approach of Dr. Hector."

Rally for Chilean allies

Fourteen members of the Chile Solidarity Committee who protested against the federal immigration department's policy on Chilean refugees in mid-November will face trespassing charges Wednesday at 2 pm in courtroom 33, old City Hall building.

The charges stem from the occupation of Immigration Department offices at University and Dundas Streets by about 50 people on November 19. The 14 occupiers and their supporters were seeking political refugee status for Chileans affected by the September military coup, and demanding the firing of Canada's ambassador to Chile, Andrew Ross, for the part he played in the immigration policy decisions. (Cables leaked by NDP MP John Harney outlined Ross' role in the Chilean coup.)

The November protest in Toronto coincided with similar demonstrations across Canada — in Montreal, Peterborough, Vancouver, and Winnipeg. In Vancouver, for example, 10 demonstrators were arrested and charged with common assault after being removed from the office of the regional director of the immigration department. In Winnipeg, 15 persons occupied the immigration department offices on the 14th floor of a downtown office building, while others picketed outside. However, these protestors left the offices after a four-hour sit-in.

The Canadian government failed to produce a clearly-defined policy, and the immigration department seemed to be deliberately obstructing Chilean refugees from entering the country. For these reasons, we feel people sympathetic to the protestors and the issues they were trying to raise should offer their support Wednesday at 2 pm. A demonstration is planned for the front steps of the old City Hall building, shortly before 2 pm.

Pressure and protest over immigration policy are the only visible reasons why the Canadian government eventually relented and allowed a certain number of refugees into the country. Such peaceful protests are, we believe, legitimate and the 14 accused should not be punished for their attempts to influence government policy.

The 14 arrested November 19 would appreciate support for their stand against the Canadian government and would like to see people come out for a pre-trial demonstration Wednesday.

Pressure can still be exerted through letter-writing on immigration and manpower minister Robert Andras, to allow more Chilean refugees into the country and to serve notice that people support the rights of dissenters to protest for changes in government policy.

People sympathetic to the plight of Chilean refugees and their Canadian supporters should make their voices heard Wednesday at the old city hall building.

SAC bargaining an 'about-face'

Some SAC members, who are supported by the U of T Communist Club, and a few other individuals, are presently involved in negotiations with the administration in order to work out amendments to the discipline code. This is an about-face to their former position that the code is unamendable. These negotiators now think that amendments to the discipline code will be accepted by students at a time when a mass and rapidly growing opposition to the discipline code is demanding its total rejection. Demands for the rejection of the discipline code have come from APUS, GSU, SAC, GATE, the Student Medical Society, the Trinity, Innis, Victoria, and New College student councils, the nursing student council, and the music student council - just to name a few. All eight student members of the Governing Council have called for rejection, and thousands of students have already signed the petition to reject the discipline code.

Amendments to the code are totally unacceptable, no matter how far-reaching those amendments might be. Why? The administration has made it perfectly clear that it needs a discipline code to suppress students' basic democratic rights and that it is willing to do anything to get that code implemented. This includes amending the code, passing those sections that cause the least opposition now, and then passing the other sections later when student opposition has died down.

Allowing an amended code to be implemented gives the administration exactly what it needs - the basic structure and legitimacy of a discipline code that can be added to and filled out at later dates, whenever the administration chooses. Not only that, the administration has also indicated that it can use the Caput (the university's present discipline structure) to discipline so-called "offenders" under those sections of the code not agreed to in the present negotiations.

The administration cannot implement the discipline code against the students' demand for rejection. On the contrary, the discipline code can only be implemented with student support and co-operation. The discipline code is designed to control student dissent and would be totally ineffective unless students were willing to support its adoption and implementation. Students refused to recognize the legitimacy of the Caput and so the administration has now sought to strengthen its control with a discipline code. Student opposition is precisely the reason why the administration did not unilaterally implement the discipline code. And student opposition is the reason why the administration is so energetically seeking a negotiated agreement for the adoption and implementation of the code. The administration wants this discipline code to work.

Last Friday's Varsity reported that Jill Conway, the internal affairs vice-president and co-author of the discipline code, asked the executive committee of the Governing Council to recognize the necessity of campus-wide consensus on discipline. The executive committee refused. They refused because the growing student opposition's demand for rejection shows quite conclusively that there is no student consensus with the administration on adoption of the discipline code. The administration wants to continue the negotiations and hopes to make "substantial progress" by March, at which time the amended code could be passed, delaying other sections until possibly next January (see last Friday's Varsity). What a coincidence! Students just happen to be writing mid-term exams and papers in March, and are, as a result, less able to mobilize large numbers of students in action to reject the code.

The administration is clearly attempting to implement the code behind the backs of students by using a few SAC members to legitimize this process through their continuing negotiations.

If the discipline code is implemented in any form, the administration will use its arbitrary powers to put a stop to the legitimate and just struggles of the majority for their rights. The discipline code means the repression and destruction of the right to free speech, freedom of the press, and the right to organize. In short, it means the repression and destruction of democratic rights on campus.

Although political views held by members of the faculty may range from progressive to very reactionary, the government's sweeping cutbacks in educational spending place the objective interests of the entire faculty (with the exception of those faculty who have become administrators) squarely with those of the students. In the past few years, the government-initiated and the administration-piloted cutbacks have resulted in the following: wage freezes and salary cuts to faculty members; the loss of hundreds of teaching positions and course options, the loss of complete departments in several universities, the general decline in the quality of education, and a general decline in the accessibility to education in universities across Ontario and in other parts of Canada. The discipline code would give the administration the power to stop struggles against the cutbacks on this campus at the moment they begin.

As the editorial in last Friday's Varsity pointed out - "If the code isn't stopped, students will be subjected to one of the most repressive documents ever seen in a Canadian university."

The discipline code must be rejected. SAC, GSU, APUS, and all student organizations must throw all their efforts and resources together to build the campaign to mobilize students for the rally to reject the code. The rally is to take place at 3:30 this Thursday afternoon - one hour before the Governing Council meeting begins.

The campaign to defeat the code must be an on-going one. Students and their organizations must remain prepared to mobilize for any administration attempts to implement this code behind the backs of students or to adopt any other discipline code.

Come to the rally - Reject the discipline code!

U of T Young Socialists

Hillel opposes discipline code

We strongly oppose the new discipline code and demand that it be repealed. Both its specific clauses and the lack of responsiveness to students' complaints make the administration's motives more than merely suspect. More specifically, it seems the administration desires a code to legitimize its ability to suppress demonstrations by putting it in a legalistic context.

We strongly support the demand for parity. As long as control of the dynamics of university interactions is not vested significantly in students, any attempt to discipline an unacceptable situation is regrettable. The code is asking us to discipline our fellow students when they don't control the circumstances from which the offences arise. We insist that demonstrations be dealt with on the basis of the substantive issues of that demonstration. Any attempt to do otherwise is warring.

More specifically, we demand that the three student organizations have veto power over the appointment of the 'independent' prosecutor and judge. We also demand that the sections involving 'double jeopardy', demonstrations, conspiracy and 'obeying all lawful orders' be repealed.

In concluding, we believe there should be discipline for certain more responsive concerns. These would include racist teaching and marking practices, refusing operational agreement in the classroom, discriminatory marking practice which must embody innocence unless proven guilty, an impartial jury of peers and a right of free legal counsel.

More on the Vic boycott debate

I am writing this letter in the hopes that I can contribute to the great debate on the eating of California grapes at Burwash Hall. In the Monday, January 14 edition of your paper you published a letter by two of the dons in which they criticized the men in the residence for their refusal to support the grape boycott.

A letter by one of the students concerned (Mr. Michael Foulkes of Ryerson House) followed. Obviously acting in a fit of irreverence, Mr. Foulkes decided to take his Don to task and wrote a rejoinder which appeared in the Varsity on January 18.

Thus, started down the road to rebellion and revolution, Mr. Foulkes proceeded to direct a few barbs at several more prominent figures in our society, notably Mayor Crombie and the Pope.

In taking this approach Mr. Foulkes was perhaps trying to conceal the fact that he was defending the truly reactionary position adopted by the students in their refusal of support for the boycott. The decision after-all had been in effect, to not bother maintaining a thin veil of liberal pretenses in even the most painless fashion.

As a member of Gate House I am proud to say we voted in near unanimity to support the boycott. I will also add that we did indeed take into consideration the position of the Roman Catholic and United Churches before voting. For this we see no need to apologize.

Today is World Religion Day

Today Canadian Bahá'í (Ba-ha-ee) Communities will observe World Religion Day. The theme of the observance is: World Religion-Basis for World Unity. Bahá'is remind us that the attainment of world unity begins in our home, our places of work, our town. It begins when we cut down the barriers that separate men-when we abandon the religious, racial, political, economic, and patriotic prejudices that cause disunity, violence and war. In this age of space travel, we must learn to see ourselves as citizens of the world.

Medicine article 'demeans' nursing

The article entitled "Women and medicine: sorcery and sexism" of January 14, 1974 demeans the profession of nursing. The authors in this excerpt state that "nursing... is simply a workplace extension of our roles as wife and mother," which seems to indicate their ignorance of the contributions of nursing in the health care system, and I mean in for example, teaching, research and expansion of the nursing role. These certainly are not contained in defined roles of wife and mother. Particularly, leaders in the nursing profession are questioning the functions, education etc. of the profession and are attempting now more than ever to define and refine the role of the nurse. Finally, I find sweeping and out-dated generalizations such as "...the female majority of the health work force are "good" workers - docile and passive," unbelievable.

In the face of potentially inaccurate and optimistic estimation of Canada's oil and gas reserves, Canada's proven reserves of oil have declined for four consecutive years, and our future natural gas reserves index has shrunk from 25 to 13 years. The liberal estimates of future Canadian petroleum discoveries are used by the industry to dispel any fear of future Canadian shortages, thus maintaining export levels to the US.

Depleting the reserves has placed growing pressure on the frontier areas, including the Atlantic offshore.

And yet, while the federal and provincial governments remain involved in a jurisdictional dispute over control of offshore rights, neither body has proposed a concrete program to ensure maximum regional economic benefits from oil and gas development.

Federal performance in the field of petroleum leases gives some indication of the probable ineffectiveness of that government in capping the best deal for Maritimers.

University of British Columbia Professor Andrew Thompson and law student Michael Crommelin write that "the Canada Oil and Gas Land Regulation of 1961 were debated only in the boardrooms of government departments and oil corporations. Few Canadians know about them even now and few are aware that the government of that day gave the oil industry carte blanche, telling them to write the kind of regulations that would create incentive for northern development. As a result we have a resource 'give-away' unparalleled in any country in modern times."

PROVINCIAL REGULATIONS UNKNOWN

Since Nova Scotia offshore oil and gas regulations, rumoured to be drawn up in preliminary form, have yet to be publicized or put into effect there is no indication of the quality of future provincial performance in this area.

What we do know, however, is that the Nova Scotian government is optimistic—probably unjustifiably so—in their estimation of future benefits from possible oil and gas developments.

An independent study funded by the federal departments of regional economic expansion and energy, mines and resources indicates that direct employment resulting from offshore oil developments will be minimal.

The report concludes realistically that the best potential for regional economic advance will be in the areas of support services to the petroleum industry—ship-building, food and supplies, etc.—and the development of new offshore drilling technologies and equipment for the rigorous Atlantic environment.

To best realize these potential benefits, the study recommends the mobilization of government agencies to prepare for the industry in these areas, especially where outside competition is likely. To date there has been little indication of this type of action by the province.

It has, however, carried out its own alternative study, and claims that the forecast for economic spin-off from the oil and gas industry is much more promising than the federal government report indicates. The provincial report has not been published.

The second category of energy resources is that of geography—the availability of land for energy developments—and ordinarily would be of little significance had not a growing environmental awareness in the north-eastern United States prevented the unrestricted construction of oil refineries, nuclear power plants, and super ports.

AMERICAN DEVELOPERS TEMPTED

It is not a coincidence that Nova Scotia Premier Gerald Regan appeared recently in New York, tempting American developers to Nova Scotia where environmental safeguards and restrictions weren't in effect.

The problem with Regan's open invitation is that we do not have all that much geography to spare, and secondly, the environment does matter in a province where tourism and primary industries such as fisheries and agriculture make up a sizeable portion of the economy.

It is evident, in the light of the Nixon administration's economic policies, that long-term free entry of Canadian energy into the US simply will not be allowed.

What will happen is the necessary return of manufactured goods to this country to balance energy exports—oil and gas and electricity—to the United States. Canada will once again find itself in the position of exporting its resources, in this case energy, capturing little of the labour inherent in the resource, to fire the industrial machinery of other countries.

In this atmosphere, Maritime industrial development will be stifled. And that balanced economy will be just as elusive when, for lack of any kind of regional and national policy, we suffer the impact of high-pollution, low-employment refineries, super-ports and the like.

We will have all this because our governments, and ultimately the people who elect them, believe what they want to believe about the role of energy developments in our industrial prospects.

Unquestionably, we can expect no handouts from American-based multinational corporations where our governments, in an optimistic stupor, will not provide for an alternative to this kind of economic growth.

Expressway revival: 400 extension proposed

In a proposal bearing an uncanny resemblance to the Spadina Expressway, the Metro Transportation Plan Review (MTPR) has submitted an idea to extend Highway 400 south from Highway 401 to the Gardiner Expressway.

The idea really is not that new, but the MTPR planners have suggested pulling it off the shelf for a second look. The extension idea was quickly forgotten after the Spadina Expressway was halted in 1971. The MTPR is empowered by Metro to put together a master plan for transportation requirements for the next 25 years.

An extension of Highway 400 would plow south through residential areas roughly parallel to but about two miles west of the Spadina Expressway route

Based on eight-year-old information, as many as 7,400 people could be displaced by such an extension and up to 87 acres of industrial land could be taken in addition to a two-mile section of the Blac, Creek Valley parkland.

Metro is still serious about the expressway extension, serious enough about it that outgoing Metro planning commissioner Wojciech Wronski has criticised the Borough of York for removing the extension from the borough's official plan.

His planning board has even gone so far as to register an objection with the provincial government over the removal.

However, York made the deletion after the provincial transportation ministry informed York it should not include any road in the official plan unless there had been prior provincial approval.

Borrowing an argument from the Scarborough Expressway debate, the MTPR planners say the Highway 400 extension would help serve the Toronto International Airport.

Then borrowing an argument from the Spadina debate the planners say the extension would provide a route for trucks entering the city.

Meanwhile, the ghost of Spadina also moves into the Metro executive committee tomorrow when that committee is to decide what to do with the 120 houses Metro expropriated for the Expressway.

The houses are part of 168 properties Metro has on its hands, and the committee is to consider release for public sale of the properties.

Who gets the goodies will be the name of the game and three likely possibilities are up for grabs.

The first is giving the former owners of the houses the first chance to buy their houses back.

The second is a bid by the Ontario Housing Corporation (OHC) for first shot at the homes, which OHC considers to be prime pickings for multi-bedroom accommodation for low-income people.

The third possibility is to turn the houses loose on a first-come-first-serve, highest-bidder-takes-all open market deal, which would probably cut out the former owners and the OHC.

If those two expressways, Spadina and Highway 400, are not enough to keep Metro politicians busy, the Scarborough Expressway was brought back in the limelight yesterday with a prediction of even more houses to be ripped down.

William Malone, president of DeLew Cather—the firm which designed the current proposal, announced it will now require the destruction of more than 650 homes to build the easterly extension of the Gardiner Expressway, an increase of 73 from the firm's earlier estimates.

The revision also includes an $8 million increase in price to $360 million.

The MTPR people also have a finger in this pie, and they are supposed to recommend to Metro Council by March 11 whether the Gardiner extension should be built.

So far the easterly extension has brought howls of protest from east-end residents, particularly from the city's neighborhood of Riverdale.

'Rich won't abandon cars'

By DAVID SIMMONDS

Low and middle income commuters are more willing than high income groups to shift their mode of transportation, a British Columbia transportation analyst said Friday.

Professor G.R. Brown, of the University of British Columbia, was speaking on mode shift and parking policy

Brown is concerned with finding ways to make people change their mode of transportation, from cars to "park and ride" public transit systems and has conducted several studies of the problem in the Vancouver area.

He has also found people under 40 are more resistant to a change in transportation mode or government policy than over - 40's.

Single-car owners offer greater resistance than multiple owners of a car, he said.

Brown has surveyed Vancouver commuters to determine what would make them voluntarily switch to a park and ride transit system.

One study found people would change mode if there were a five-minute decrease in travel time, if the parking rates downtown were doubled, or if the bus frequency were decreased from 17 to five minutes.

This study predicted there would be a 15 per cent shift in transportation mode. In fact, the shift proved to be less.

However, in another park and ride route adopted, there was a 40 per cent mode shift, said Brown.

In general, Brown said, park and ride systems attract commuters of middle and low income status. To be successful, these systems must cost no more than automobile transportation, and must provide ample free parking at transit terminals.

For transportation planners, Brown advocated the integration of parking policy into transportation systems, gradual changes in policy as a means to effect change, and a careful consideration of the commuter market.

Brown has also reached important conclusions on the nature of civilized man. The longest a Vancouver commuter is prepared to walk, he said, is two minutes.

U of T, however, is pursuing different directions in its parking policy.

A document still before the internal affairs committee of Governing Council calls on the university to begin construction of parking structures as part of a phasing-out of surface parking lots.

That policy recommendation from internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway is being considered despite a plea from Alderman Colin Vaughan urging U of T to be a pacesetter and restrict downtown traffic by restricting parking.

Up to the date of submission of this advertisement, the Variety has refused to print any material on Dr. Ian Hector, professor of psychiatry because they say it is not an issue of interest to students. But even Variety's own letters page tells a different story: of 162 letters printed last term, 32 dealt with racism, 20 with the Middle East, and 10 with the Variety's favorite - discipline. There's a big gap between the Variety editor's imaginary conception of what his readers are interested in, and what they show with their own letters are their real concerns.

Dr. Ian Hector Must Be Stopped

Dr. Ian Hector, Professor of Psychiatry and Chief Psychiatrist at Wellesley Hospital in a report on Giuseppe Pulera, an Italian bricklayer injured in a construction accident:

"Examination of the mental state revealed a highly tense, anxious and rather angry Italian man... General physical examination revealed a healthy, robust adult Italian male... The essential problem is that of a poorly acculturated Italian... culturally and personally predisposed."

As a result of Hector's report, (November 2, 1970) Pulera was awarded workmen's compensation of $90.00 per month, even though to this day he can walk only with the aid of two canes. Following demonstrations and other protests in 1972 Pulera's compensation was increased to $145.00 per month.

Michael Starr, chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board, answered complaints about Hector by firing him:

He (Starr) said: "Most of the committee's demands were legitimate, especially the necessity for prompt payment of claims and moves to end discrimination against immigrants. Mr. Starr promised that the WCB would break contact with Dr. Ian Hector, a consulting psychiatrist. The committee claimed that in his reports Dr. Hector associated certain character traits with Italians. 'I have spent my whole life fighting to stamp out discrimination,' Mr Starr said. 'Suffice it so say that I am not in agreement with the approach of Dr. Hector.'" (Globe and Mail, Sept. 13, 1973)

Dr. Erik Wright, Director of Clinical Psychology Program, University of Kansas:

"I regretfully conclude that I find a tone of hostility and prejudice toward the patient's nationality in Dr. Hector's report which seemed to result in punitive recommendations for disposition of the patient's claims that are not based upon psychiatric principles of treatment, but rather upon Dr. Hector's personal feelings about the patient's cultural origins and the social problems presented by the larger ethnic group to which the patient belongs."

Over the last two months, the Italian community in Toronto has launched major protests about Hector. Il Giornale di Toronto, Toronto's weekly Italian paper, has run a series of front page stories about Hector and other examples of anti-Italian racism at the University of Toronto.

"Some Italian students have shown with documentation which leaves no doubt that at the U of T there is a movement that foments hate and racism against Italians... Using abusively a medical record of an injured Italian worker, Hector has instigated a campaign of denigration against the whole community by insinuating that injured workers are predisposed to play a sick role."

You can help stop Hector:

1. Sign the petition, and collect the signatures of your friends and fellow students and professors.
2. Join us next Thursday at 3:30 p.m. at Simcoe Hall when we present the petitions to the Governing Council. The editor of Il Giornale di Toronto will speak at the Governing Council meeting about Hector.

Take signed petitions to the SDS table in Sidney Smith Lobby, between 11 a.m. and 3 p.m., Monday to Thursday this week, or mail them to: SDS, c/o ASSU, Sidney Smith Hall, University of Toronto.

If you are willing to help the campaign, drop by the Sid Smith table, or phone 928-4903, 535-0121, or 921-7937.

PETITION

Recently on university campuses in Canada, the US, and Europe, there has been a disturbing rise of pseudo-scientific racist theories, citing the genetic or cultural inferiority of various racial or national groups. The U of T unfortunately is not isolated from this phenomenon. Dr. R. Ian Hector, Psychiatrist in Chief at Wellesley Hospital and Associate Professor of Psychiatry at U of T is using the prestige and authority of his position to lend credence to such theories.

Hector says that Italian workers who are injured on the job are "culturally predisposed" to play a sick role. It becomes apparent that in his former role as a consultant to the Ontario Workmen's Compensation Board he brought direct harm to workers since his theories justified cuts in their disability pensions. For example, in one report, a totally disabled worker of whom he said "the essential problem is that of a poorly acculturated Italian" ended up with a pension of $93 a month. After a number of protests he was dropped by the Board on grounds of his discriminatory attitude.

We believe that such theories have neither a place in the medical school nor in the University community. Hector, when questioned by students, has vigorously defended them.

Above all, they should not be taught to future medical personnel who could in turn employ them at the expense of people's welfare.

We therefore submit that Dr. Ian Hector be relieved of his duties at U of T unless a thorough and open investigation proves these charges unfounded.

Most U of T profs Canadian

By BOB BETTSON

For the first time statistics are available on the numbers of foreign professors at U of T.

In 1971 46.9 per cent of U of T professors were Canadian citizens with nine per cent Americans, 7.8 per cent British and 33.8 per cent unreported.

But by 1973, 66.7 per cent were Canadians with 13.2 per cent Americans and 7.5 per cent British and 5.1 per cent unreported.

However there is no breakdown for individuals. In the past U of T has been among the worst offenders in not reporting citizenship.

Teh breakdown is offered in the interim report of the Select Committee on Economic and Cultural Nationalism released by the Ontario legislature.

The lowest percentage of Canadians is in the social sciences with only 47.6 per cent holding Canadian citizenship. The highest is in the applied social sciences with 82 per cent.

The highest number of Americans, for all you nationalists, is in the social sciences with 28.2 per cent. The Walter Gordon award goes to the medical sciences where only four per cent are Yankees.

Honourable mentions for the Mel Watkins award for the highest number of Canadians go to Medical Sciences with 80.7 per cent pure and applied physical sciences with 65.4 per cent.

The percentages by department for country of last degree are also included.

The Harry G. Johnson award goes to the economics department with 75 per cent American training with political science following closely behind with 56.9 per cent American trained.

Also high up are History with 50.8 per cent American trained and Sociology with a whopping 82.9 per cent US trained.

However more professors are trained outside the country than teach in Canada. Here again the honors go to sociology with 48.8 per cent Americans and philosophy following with 40.4 per cent.

One of the highest Canadian percentages is again notched up by law faculty with 81.5 per cent Canadian professors.

The report calls for quotas for Canadian citizenship in new appointments and comes firmly down on the side of Canadian nationalism.

There has been a cool response from the universities and also from student groups who have called the move tokenism, demanding teaching quality as the most important hiring criteria.

Gov Council to be confronted over 'racist' prof

By TIM GALLAGHER

Students and members of Toronto's Italian community plan to confront the Governing Council Thursday with petitions demanding the administration launch an investigation into U of T medical professor R. Ian Hector.

Hector has been under fire for at least a year regarding what has been termed a racist theory which alleges injured Italian workers are "culturally predisposed" to play a sick role.

Demands that Hector's teaching practices be investigated have heightened since Il Giornale di Toronto, an Italian community newspaper with a circulation of about 10,000, recently published a series of articles on its front page attacking Hector's theories.

The paper accuses Hector of encouraging "hatred" against Italians and calls for his firing from the U of T. The paper has received several hundred signatures on a petition to this effect, and plans to present them to the Governing Council Representatives of several Italian community groups reportedly also plan to attend.

The campaign was begun last fall by Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), which claims that "such theories have neither a place in the medical school nor in the University community," and plans to present signatures collected on the petition concerning Hector to the Governing Council.

Until now, the U of T administration has refused to discuss the issues in public. At the last Governing Council meeting, president John Evans and chairman Malim Harding refused to allow any debate about Hector.

Hector himself has refused to talk to anyone publicly, including the press.

"We want to bring him into the open," said Tony Marzili, a member of the U of T Italian Club. "We don't think somebody like him should be allowed to teach at the university," Marzili added.

Hector was a consulting psychiatrist for the Ontario Workmen's Compensation Board but was relieved of his position last fall after demonstrations at the board by the committee for Just Compensation.

When confronted by students in class about his statements on Italians, Hector reportedly said one Italian workman he diagnosed as playing a "sick role" was a "typical case" and needed to be "pushed up against the wall."

The U of T Italian Club and other concerned groups and individuals are demanding Hector be fired from his position at the university "unless an open and thorough investigation proves the charges of racism unfounded."

The controversy surrounding Hector is illustrated in a documented report he did on an injured Italian worker.

The worker, who was crippled in a construction accident was subjected to cuts in his compensation payments. He then appealed and was referred to Hector for further diagnosis.

Hector assessed the worker's injury as only 15 per cent of his total disability. Although acknowledging the bricklayer's back pain made him totally unable to work, Hector, in his report, concluded:

"The essential problem is that of a poorly acculturated Italian with a grossly limited educational background from a deprived socio-economic region."

Ending a report filled with references to the worker as physically and mentally Italian, Hector says he is "culturally and personally predisposed" to play a sick role.

Michael Starr, the new board chairman who fired Hector, has been quoted as saying:

"I have spent my whole life fighting to stamp out discrimination. Suffice it to say that I am not in agreement with the approach of Dr. Hector."

Hector's views were opposed by Eric Wright, director of clinical psychology at the University of Kansas.

A U of T faculty member sent Hector's report on the injured bricklayer to Wright and received a letter from Wright in which he states:

"I find a tone of hostility and prejudice toward the patient's nationality in Dr. Hector's report."

He wrote further that Hector's recommendations regarding the worker's payment claims "are not based on psychiatric principles of treatment, but rather upon Dr. Hector's personal feelings about the patient's cultural origins and the social problems presented by the larger ethnic group to which the patient belongs."

Kraft moves into N. Zealand

SASKATOON (CUP) — Kraftco has staged an 80 percent takeover of the New Zealand local processed cheese market.

The New Zealand department of trade and industry confirmed November 5 that the New Zealand government had granted "in principle" approval of the proposed takeover of New Zealand Cheese Ltd., by Kraftco.

The minister of trade and industry said November 2 the takeover would increase New Zealand's cheese processing expertise and it was expected that by using Kraft's name and skills, access would be gained to markets from which New Zealand was excluded because of the dominance of well established brands.

The president of the New Zealand Federated Farmers' dairy section, J.D. O'Connor, said November 6 the move was "handing over" control of 80 percent of New Zealand's local processed cheese market to a powerful multi-national concern.

It seems Kraft would continue to buy New Zealand dairy products regardless of whether the takeover went through because of the productive excellence and the continuity of supply.

The secretary of the Federation of Labor suggest November 7 the government should call a conference of labour, the Federated Farmers and other affected parties to discuss the takeover. The minister of agriculture and fisheries said November 8, after a meeting with union leaders, that the government had undertaken to have further talks with union representatives.

However negotiations were of no avail.

On November 28 the governments' dairy board gave its consent to the takeover.

The conditions under which Kraft has agreed to operate are that it will purchase its raw cheese only from, or by arrangement with the dairy board, and that it will downcut its selling of processed cheese under the board's control and in conformity with the board's trading policies. Kraft consented it will continue to process and pack cheese of the board in dairy industry brands on request. No quantitative limit will be placed on its processed cheese production, but the company has accepted in principle that net sales of natural cheese on local markets will be limited, the amount being subject to periodic review.

On the same day, the New Zealand minister of overseas trade presented the dairy board with a Trades Promotion Council export award. He said recent diversification in both products and markets had been tremendous.

Kraft is currently producing the Canadian cheese festival. As part of their cheese festival a leaflet was circulated purporting to give the history of cheese in Canada. It said that in 1867 there were 200 cheese factories in Ontario. It neglected to say there were only 42 left now.

Kraft, with the help of a few friends, has crowded the rest out.

Excellent interpretation of Ibsen's Peer Gynt

Henrik Ibsen's Peer Gynt is now playing at the Hart House Theatre until Saturday, and, if you want to see a major achievement in staging the impossible, don't miss it. With a small cast of 22 to fill some 64 roles, Frederick Marker has devised an excellent interpretation of Ibsen's dramatic poem revealing the Norwegian Everyman as a fun-filled fairy-tale frolic.

This fairy-tale, however, has a crack. Peer Gynt is permeated with undercutting irony, satire, and the ever-present dark shadow of the "Button Moulder," collecting useless souls for the casting iadle. Peer is an emperor searching for his empire, unaware that his empire — that which makes him unique and individual — is within himself. Peer imagines, assumes, aspires — fabricating dreams to soften the blows dealt by the world.

Maarten van Dijk turns in a superb portrayal in one of theatre's most demanding roles. As Peer, van Dijk captures the audience with his broad boastful story-telling, gives just the right twist to Ibsen's ironic undercutting and handles gently, softly and swiftly the very difficult death and recognition scenes. With energy and skill to spare, van Dijk may truly boast of his Peer.

There are several other masterful performances which should not go unpraised. Peter Lower breathes life and personality into both Aslak, the smith, and the sea captain. The characterizations are varied and he's a pleasure to both watch and hear.

Robertson Davies, the Great Boyg, brings out the beauty and rhythm of Ibsen's poetry with a deft artistry reminiscent of the sly malevolence tinging Orson Welles.

John Cartwright, as the button moulder, is perfection. With a sophisticated calm, a beautiful voice and total mastery of his text, he sublimely underplays and undercuts the broad humour and lightning pace of those around him. Where Cartwright is austere sophisticated, James Dugan, the Thin Person, is ironically flippant to the same satisfying ends.

The only truly jarring performance is by Estee Cooper as Peer's mother, Aase. Cooper is hampered by poor breath control and a sing-song style that destroys the poetry. Her delivery is irritating, and eventually impossible to listen to.

It seems, however, that this is the year of the designer at Hart House. Once again the stage is a beautiful picture in itself. Martha Mann's inventive set of bleachers and platforms surrounded by two-dimensional barren-branched tree-like arches is stark, open, and a wonderful playground for creativity. Add to this Peter Woodsworth's magnificent lighting, which paints, sculpts, emphasizes and defines the play at any given moment. Of special note are the patterns which constantly washed the eye, the light show accompanying the Great Boyg, and the leaf-and-branch motif of the opening sequence.

The Sæter girl scene from the Hart House Theatre's production of Peer Gynt.

Both the set and the Lighting offered wonderful possibilities for the staging of Marker's excellent interpretation of Michael Meyer's translation. Unfortunately, at Wednesday night's preview, most of these possibilities went unrealized. The staging, for the most part, was either static or suffering from grave traffic problems.

And how shall I describe Katherine Govier's choreography. Abysmal is far too good for it. It was uninspired, uncreative and did justice neither to the score (an excellent combination of contemporary Norwegian and Danish music) nor to the text. It was an embarrassment to the otherwise fine calibre of the production and should not have been allowed on the stage.

However, Marker's production of Peer Gynt rises above these maladies mainly through his painstaking care with the text and the energy and skill of the majority of his cast. It is an exciting theatrical experience and this critic highly recommends it.

God marries Poppins

By KATHERINE ROWCLIFFE

"The Lord is the father of all things, Mary Poppins is the mother of all things, and they are married, or have been married, and it is all a miracle."

This was how one child explained the universe to P.L. Travers who enchanted an audience at OISE Friday evening, with a speech about the mythology of fairy tales.

Travers was the writer in residence at Claremont, Smith and Radcliffe Colleges and claims she was "largely hiked into shape" by the Irish poet W.B. Yeats.

The creator of the now proverbial, very proper governess asked the audience to overlook her laryngitis and consider her a Frog Prince who would try to summon up the Golden Ball.

She invited the audience into the realm of childhood, the realm of imagination which she said was accessible to all ages.

Travers seeks the original, true tales common to all cultures and dismissed those of Hans Christian Andersen and even Walt Disney, as contrived.

In his introduction, professor Robert O'Driscoll of St. Michael's College spoke of the artist as a reed tossed to the wind to gather impulses and forces blowing from beyond the world.

Travers elaborated on this, explaining the original fairy tales came from the myths. Myths, she asserted, originate with the fermentation of man working on eternal ideas.

She stressed myth was not created but rather, summoned, and said of J.R.R. Tolkien's work "He always said it had no moral but of course it's reeking of the myths."

She traced the development and distortion of several fairy tales and gave the example of Perrault who introduced the fairy godmother, the troop of rats, pumpkins and glass slippers to Cinderella.

It was also he who made Cinderella synonymous with wishful thinking. Travers finds this aspect unsatisfactory for it suggests the maid could have wished her situation away.

Travers compared Cinderella to Tennyson's "Beggary Maid" and King Lear's Cordelia.

She emphasized the child "whose thinking is always mythological," and gave, as an example, the tale one child told her in which the child came upon a house in the wood. Three old women greeted the child who promptly entered and spanked the women.

"We all know the three Fates," said Travers. "Very few of us have the courage to spank them."

She also affirmed the existence of the world of happily ever after.

It is the world of Rumpelstiltskin "where the fox and the hare say good night to each other."

Travers said all men seek this world where strong and weak lie down together and opposites are reconciled.

She criticized those who think this realm is accessible with a "whiff of smoke or a pill."

"It's within our power. Its given to us at birth," and that was all the frog had to say.

Placebos for pedestrians

Ever wonder what's wrong with the traffic light on Queen's Park Crescent? When the button is pushed the damn thing never turns red to let pedestrians cross.

According to Karl Mallette, Scarborough controller and member of Metro transportation committee, it's supposed to be that way.

During a recent committee meeting, Mallette let the cat out of the bag when he explained the "pushbutton is just there to make people happy."

Boxing exhibition planned

By DAVID C MILLER

The U of T boxing team, under the direction of coach Tony Canzano, is currently in preparation for a boxing exhibition, which will take place as part of the "Athletic Night" this Tuesday 22 January at 8 p.m.

This will be strictly exhibition boxing, which means that there will be no decision matches.

It promises, nevertheless, to be an exceptionally good show of at least ten bouts, ranging in weight classes from flyweight (not over 112 pounds) through heavyweight (175 pounds and over). The card will feature members of the U of T boxing team as well as outside competition from Toronto, Ajax and Oshawa.

Coach Canzano has been putting the team through rigorous training sessions every day of the week. These workouts are one hour in duration, and are divided into two and one half-minute "rounds" of skipping, shadow-boxing, sparring, and calisthenics.

Canzano thinks the "team looks very good this year" and feels that this card will be instrumental in giving experience to the newer members of the team. It will also help him to choose those members which will represent the University at a tournament in Buffalo on 12 February.

Blues defeat Queen's 4 - 2

By DAVID COOK

The theory that the Ice Blues' winning instinct is genetically linked to coach Tom Watt was supported Friday night at Varsity arena as Toronto's solid defence effort corked Queens Golden Gaels 4-2.

A lineup garnished with rookies invariably has a legitimate excuse for weak defensive play. However that adage was discredited by a solid defence performance that rationed Queen's to only fourteen shots at Robert Oss in the Toronto nets.

Guided by Warren Anderson and Gord Davies, Toronto maintained it's unblemished record with the winning combination of hard working rookies like Dough Hertridge and an adequate sprinkling of seasoned players. The close score wasn't indicative of the play. Excellent goaltending by Queen's Dave Dungey who faced forty shots was responsible for Blues lack of scoring punch.

Throughout the game any inclination towards aggression by the Gaels was stymied by a defensive barrier that resembled the Maginot Line.

The way the Toronto's rookie wingers religiously kept with their checks provided conclusively that Watt has instilled in this year's crop of rookies a respect for disciplined positional style of play.

In sharp contrast Queen's appeared to be stricken by the perilous characteristic of playing the puck rather than the man. The Gaels' inertia by their wingmen could have been solved by playing their positions.

A lonely Queen's forward wasn't much of a challenge for the Toronto defence especially when he forced to wait for his tardy linemates or face the defence alone. Queen's uncoordinated play allowed the Toronto forwards to come back quickly and blanket any potential attack.

Nevertheless the boisterous crowd of about 1500 saw a good game that opened with lots of fireworks that gradually fizzled out as the game progressed. The third place Gaels played well in the first period aided by the experience of such veterans as ex-Blue Rick Leroy, Colin Loudon, Ivan Sunstrom and Bob Clayton.

Juan McFarlane opened the scoring early in the period for Toronto when he tipped in a hard shot by Mike Lauder from the point. But it didn't take Queen's long to reply when Chris Clark beat Oss cleanly from the point after taking Don Langill's pass from the corner at 5:22 and then Jim Sunstrom came close when he was sent in alone on Oss on a musclee by Lauder. Oss, who shows more confidence in the cage than Campbell, stood his ground and Sunstrom had nothing to shoot at.

At the other end of the rink Queen's was enjoying a measure of defensive success covering up well and intercepting many centering passes by Toronto forwards, but they were still unable to get untracked in the centre ice area.

Both teams engaged in some rhuhrabs that kept things spirited and the penalty box functional. A goal off the skate of Gord Davies was disallowed. The Blues outshot Queens 15-5 in the period and had the margin in play.

Bill Fiffeld (16) loses his footing as Blues have goalie at their mercy.

Toronto had a monopoly on the scoring in the second period on goals by captain Anderson and the fleet Bill Fiffeld whose afterburners appeared to blur Dungey's vision long enough for him to neatly tuck the puck away under Dungey's right pad.

Anderson methodical and diligent checking and playmaking showed once again why he is the backbone of the Toronto team. He scored a picture goal at 1:12 after he engineered the play from his own end. His excellent pass to Doug Hertridge was reciprocated neatly by McFarlane who set up Anderson in front while both teams were playing shorthanded.

Fiffeld's goal at 3:29 was initiated when he stole the puck from Loudon at centre ice and then streaked past a mesmerized Queen's defenceman, Stu Lang, to give Toronto a commanding 3-1 lead.

Again many penalties were called as the teams continued to mix it up. A rare occasion saw Anderson drop his gloves as he prepared to set things straight with the Gaels' Bob Clayton but the quick intervention of the linesmen prevented him.

A little skating room provided to be a dangerous thing for the Gaels, especially in the context of the numerous offsetting penalties. Even when killing off penalties, Varsity ran roughshod over the disorganized Kingston squad.

The third period began with two Blues and a Gaël taking up residence in the cooler. Play continued to be rough as Mike Lauder was decked early in the period and left. Repairs enabled him to return to finish the game out.

Dave Wadden cut Toronto's lead to one goal midway through the period when the Gaels' valuable defensive returnee Brent Swanick failed to catch the puck. This allowed Clayton to set up Hadden in front of the Toronto goal for a clear shot at Oss.

Bill Hews put the icing on the cake when he restored Toronto's two goal margin less than three minutes later.

Fiffeld in the corner had set up Davies whose shot was tipped line by Hews into the right hand corner of the net.

Dungey continued his acrobatics in the nets foiling many good Toronto scoring opportunities, especially of Fiffeld again and Don Pagnutti. It was a well-earned victory for Toronto's eleventh win of the season and the rivalry between the two clubs will continue next weekend in Kingston. Spurned on by their rabid fans the Gaels will be out for revenge.

Queen's coach Dave Field predicted "It'll be different next week at home next week". But the Blues will probably be at their best and Queen's revenge will be postponed again.

In the meantime, Ryerson will provide the competition and the goals at Varsity arena this Wednesday night at 8 pm.

Blues do well at weekend swim meet

By DON WARNER

Last Saturday afternoon the Benson Building pool was the scene of the first home meet for the Blues' swim team.

What was originally supposed to have been a dual meet with the University of Ottawa had to be altered and consequently included Queen's and York universities plus the Etobicoke Memorial Aquatic Club.

The reasons which necessitated the change clearly point out why the calibre of swimming at most universities in this province and indeed for all of Canada is not very high.

The Ottawa team, for example, could only send four swimmers, a ridiculously low number with which to compete since each swimmer is restricted to three events.

It seems that at many of the Ontario universities there is a definite lack of interest in swimming. The fact that York could only send four swimmers and Queens 11 further emphasizes the problem. Perhaps this lack of interest is because swimming is more an individual sport than a team sport.

The problem is clearly reflected in the number of yards covered by swimmers at the various universities.

The numerous championships are cumulated by the U of T team, for example, is undoubtedly attributable to the longer hours put in by most swimmers. Coach Robin Campbell runs the team through two practices daily, including 4,000 yards in the morning and 5,000 in the evening. Each swimmer must make at least five practices weekly and the more serious swimmers come to seven to eight practices.

Compare this to a university like Western, where only 4,500 yards are covered daily, and it is easy to see why Toronto has remained a swimming power for years.

At most other universities not only is interest lacking, but also the desire to strive for excellence which is clearly reflected in the fewer hours devoted to the sport.

In spite of the relatively poor performances turned in by York, Ottawa and Queens, spectators were nevertheless treated to some excellent swimming from EMAC and Toronto which resulted in some exciting races.

EMAC, coached by Gaye Stratten, a former Toronto CIAU record-holder, is one of Canada's better-known clubs and has produced international swimmers. Clubs such as EMAC which develop age-group programmes produce most of this country's top swimmers.

Their presence was certainly felt on Saturday as they took seven of the 13 races in times which could have qualified the victors for the CIAU championships.

The tough competition naturally spurred the Toronto team on to better races, and John Sebben, Jay Steele, Dave Wilkin, Scott Day and Bill Chisholm in particular turned in excellent performances.

Spectators were also treated to the novelty of seeing a swimmer from Queens compete half of a 1,000 yard race without his suit. The hoots and hollers of the crowd didn't faze this particular individual who must have wanted every advantage he could get. Less resistance in the water didn't help though he finished last anyway. (No, it wasn't in the back stroke.)

The Toronto team is now looking ahead to the first weekend in February when two American colleges, Alfred Tech (Ohio) and Michigan Tech, will visit the Benson Building on consecutive nights. The Blues will send their top lineup against these two teams on a weekend that is sure to provide Toronto rooters with a superb display of swimming.

Discipline negotiations broken off

By MARINA STRAUSS

As momentum builds towards Thursday's Governing Council meeting, student representatives, charging the administration with a "blackmail attempt," have broken off all talks on the discipline code.

"Unless Governing Council is prepared to appoint a committee empowered to negotiate disputed sections of the code with us, we're not prepared to continue negotiating," SAC services commissioner Seymour Kanowitch asserted.

"We got so fed up with double-faced negotiations that we issued this ultimatum," he explained, adding student governors plan to present it as a motion at Thursday's Governing Council meeting.

Students have thus far been negotiating through internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway, co-author of the code.

According to Kanowitch, a key student negotiator, the administration gave students the choice Monday of including "a lawful order clause in the code, which legitimizes the authority of many committees without student representation, or retaining the Caput (the current university disciplinary body) to deal with all sections of the non-academic code not passed this year."

"This is their blackmail attempt," Kanowitch contended. "As far as we're concerned, all negotiations have broken off."

Kanowitch felt the administration is trying to force students to compromise.

"They're telling us to decide whether abolishing the Caput is sufficiently important to allow unacceptable clauses to get through," he said.

One of the contentious clauses would make it an offence to "disobey any lawful order, rule or regulation made by the Governing Council or any faculty body or council of the university or any authorized committee or sub-committee of any of them."

Another clause would make it an offence to disobey any lawful order of any university official.

However, a proposal which the Governing Council's executive committee is to present to council Thursday would, in effect, allow such objectionable sections to be implemented in March.

The proposal, which students rejected as "totally unacceptable" last week, stipulates if "substantial progress" is made towards reaching consensus by March, then those sections agreed upon would be implemented, and the remaining parts would not be touched upon until January, 1975.

The decision of what constitutes "substantial progress" would rest entirely in the hands of the Governing Council, students argue.

Student governors Howie Levitt and Gord Barnes plan to propose an amendment to the motion at Thursday's council meeting stipulating consensus is essential to any decision and the Caput must be abolished.

This expresses students' insistence that their consent to the Governing Council's implementation of any section of the code is not only desirable but essential, Barnes has pointed out.

He said there is a "definite split between the U of T Faculty Association (UFTA) and students" on this point.

As UFTA president Bill Nelson affirmed in an interview: "The faculty would insist such a clause (on lawful orders) be included in a discipline code."

"That clause could be used to deal with any disciplinary offence, like disruption," he noted, adding students want "to limit such powers."

However, Nelson felt "the administration does not intend to implement the non-academic sections of the code," but prefers to leave the Caput in its present form.

Kanowitch accused the faculty association of "pressuring the Governing Council."

Governing Council has been ready to reach a compromise with students until the association pressures it, he said.

In reviewing last week's abortive negotiations, Kanowitch explained that last Monday the student organizations had agreed to "a reasonable solution" with Conway.

Conway had assured students that unless there was "absolute consensus" on the contentious non-academic sections, those parts would not go before Governing Council, and, in addition, the Caput would be abolished.

"In the interim, there was a 100 per cent about-face," Kanowitch charged.

In an interview last night, Conway spelled out the administration's present stand on the issue.

"The Caput can only be phased out when Governing Council is convinced there is a functioning body to replace it," he noted.

"If there is agreement in March on the non-academic code, a working structure could be set up and the Caput could be abolished," she said.

"If there is no agreement, obviously the Caput will have to continue," Conway added.

Conway confirmed Monday's meeting with the negotiating task group consisting of students, Conway internal affairs chair woman Marrie Paikentien and faculty representatives, showed "no possibility of reaching agreement at the moment—it became very clear."

"The objections of students were political—they weren't rejecting a code, they didn't recognize the authority of certain university bodies," she said.

She reiterated "without sections relating to offenses arising out of the exercise of delegated authority," no code would be acceptable.

Admin wants to keep Caput, says Faculty Ass'n head

By MARINA STRAUSS

U of T Faculty Association president Bill Nelson feels the administration has "no intention to implement the non-academic sections of the discipline code, but prefers to retain the Caput."

The Caput, the present university disciplinary structure—consisting of faculty deans and college principals, and no students—meets behind closed doors.

Although admitting "nobody likes the Caput much," Nelson surmised in an interview last night:

"The administration never intended to give up its ultimate authority to handle discipline on campus."

He added the Caput "hasn't been efficient for 50 years" and "college principals (and faculty deans) are not a representative group."

But, Nelson noted: "The administration has decided the disciplinary code is restricting, so they'll leave the Caput."

However, internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway denied such contentions.

"I think it's the goal of everyone concerned with discipline to abolish the Caput," she insisted.

Nelson, in referring to student charges that the UFTA is pressuring Governing Council to refuse a code which does not deal with lawful orders or disruption, accused the administration of using the faculty "to play the heavies, the bad guys."

He felt the faculty is being used as a front group to represent the administration's interests.

"The faculty wants the right to hold undisturbed meetings, and it's the administration's responsibility to protect this right," Nelson noted.

"I think the administration had no intention to give up this responsibility," he asserted.

According to student governor Gord Barnes, Nelson, who feels the UFTA would never accept a code which does not deal with lawful orders, told students in a meeting last week:

"You can't expect an oppressive institution to legitimize its disruptions."

Evans reassures committee on college proposals

By RANDY ROBERTSON

University President John Evans yesterday attempted to reassure the Governing Council's academic affairs committee and the university community about the ramifications of his proposals for the federated colleges.

But Evans concentrated on the proposals in terms of what they will mean to the teaching staff—who are the greatest source of opposition to the proposals—and the boards of the colleges.

Evans emphasized there is "enthusiasm" for the educational objectives of the proposals, which are generally to increase the importance of the college to the student and the educational options available to the individual colleges.

The difficulty arises in the "mechanisms" that are to achieve those objectives.

Evans said the progress report had been endorsed only for presentation. Recommendations arising out of all matters related to the report would be brought to the governing bodies of the colleges and the governing council of the university, he reiterated.

The progress report—requested by academic affairs committee chairman John Dove because the proposals are "extremely important,"

"the attendant necessity for a well-informed committee," and for no other reason despite various rumors—goes into further detail about the proposed mechanisms.

The document explains the university department which is to be created for each of the present college subjects out of staff members of the present college departments is to be "a functioning unit, not a single physical location for all members of the department."

"It is not the intention to uproot existing members of staff," the report says.

Members of the college staffs are to have the option of continuing to hold their college appointments as well as their university department appointments.

The academic rank of existing members of college departments, their possession of tenure and their eligibility to be considered for tenure are to be fully respected by the university department.

The decisions which will eventually evolve out of the discussion by the academic affairs committee of the Forster task force regarding promotion and tenure are to apply to future appointments.

The document says the university and the federated colleges will accept as a joint responsibility "to move progressively towards the equalization of salary scales in the shortest possible time following the conversion of the departments in the present college subjects into university departments."

The progress report even suggests the consolidation of the college departments, the systematic pooling and coverage by the university department of all the various programme needs—undergraduate, graduate, part-time and professional—"will be a source of security to members of staff by cushioning the effects of fluctuations in student demands."

Every appointment or cross-appointment in any subject that is made to any college staff requires the approval of that college, and, in the case of the federated colleges, of its governing body.

Any federated college is to retain the right to make appointments to its own staff from its own resources with no recourse to funds which reach it through the university.

Such appointments, however, will have to have the approval of the appropriate university authorities if the teaching done by persons so appointed is to have academic recognition by the University.

Artistic trials continue

By TIM GALLAGHER

The trials of those arrested during the 14-week long Artistic Woodwork strike continues.

The Canadian Textile and Chemical Union (CTCU) went on strike August 21 at two Artistic Woodwork plants in North York over basic union rights.

The strike led to 118 charges being laid against 108 people, most of them strike supporters.

On Monday, a public school teacher and strike supporter, Mario Godlewski, was acquitted on a charge of mischief but not before being reprimanded by Judge Gordon Tinker.

A union court representative said, Tinker remarked at the acquittal: "I will give you the benefit of the doubt and I am acquitting you, but you have not been found innocent."

Prior to this, Tinker had reportedly commented Godlewski must have looked more like a worker than a teacher if he wore to class the boots and corduroy pants he was wearing at the picket line.

Godlewski replied he was of a working class background — his mother is a seamstress, his father a miner.

So far, 21 out of 54 persons have been acquitted in all the Artistic-related trials to date.

Next week, most workers arrested during the Artistic strike are to appear in court, and many of their supporters will also appear.

The union is urging as many people as possible to give support to those being tried by attending the trials being held at the Keele Street court at 10 and 2 each day next week.

Discipline an issue because students 'crave excitement'

By KATHERINE ROWCLIFFE

"It is a well known fact that student bodies crave a little excitement from time to time to relieve the monotony of study, and the most welcome of all disputes is a clash on a matter of principle with the administrative authorities."

The discipline debate at U of T is really not all that new, according to philosophy professor Jack Stevenson who cited the above description of an 1895 dispute in which William Lyon Mackenzie King was involved at U of T. Stevenson offered a portion of R. MacGregor Dawson's account to a group of students who attended a discussion of the discipline code at New College on Monday evening.

Howie Levitt, a student member of the Governing Council, criticized the vagueness of the code which he claimed would be used to "suppress legitimate student demands".

He asserted that the code, would, if implemented, not only break up demonstrations but also "intimidate students from actually ever demonstrating in the first place."

Law professor John Swan did admit certain sections of the discipline code were vague and susceptible to misuse, but he did not believe the entire code had to be abandoned.

Swan helped to write the code. In speaking of the lawful order provisions, Swan said: "It is of course possible that any of these provisions could be used by a bloody minded administration to get people they didn't like. I don't see how that can ever be stopped."

He went on to say, "I think though, it is a mistake to throw out the baby with the bath water just because some of these provisions are more prone or apt to be used this way, to assume that everything might be."

The code is, he concluded, an attempt to replace the jurisdiction of the Caput and suggested "at least some of the code is less objectionable than other parts."

Physics professor Jim Prentice criticized the "double jeopardy" of the code which means an offender could be tried by both the university and the law courts. He said the non-academic section of the discipline code was unnecessary.

After giving a brief history of the code, which he sees as part of the attempt to restructure the university, Prentice attempted to determine some of the origins of disruptive behavior rather than simply condemn the superficial consequences.

"Perhaps we can get away from cheating," he said, "if we recognize that the main object of a university is not arriving at a set of grades."

Prentice claimed the best prevention of cheating was the development of a "good morale" among students. He did not elaborate on the what he considered "good morale".

He maintained that independent-minded students would come to the university if students were offered more control in the direction of their education.

The consequent rise of standards Prentice envisioned would eliminate cheating because marks would cease to be the sole motivation for students.

After presenting the summary of Mackenzie King's radical exploits in an attempt to show there has never been a "golden age" in university administration when problems were solved by tradition, habit and custom, Stevenson defended the concept of the code.

"There is some merit from the student's point of view," he said, "in having the code which at least ensures certain rights."

He went on to clarify: "It cannot be simply a code of rights. Rights imply duties and the violation of these are, by definition, offences."

Both Prentice and Stevenson, are members of the Faculty Reform Caucus. Both declined to speak on behalf of the organization, and instead expressed their own personal views.

Swan justified the code's existence by explaining while theft of notes is, for example, a serious offense in the academic community, it would not constitute a major issue before a magistrate faced with various other types of theft.

He said it was essential the university have some power to act in such cases.

He stressed that the code should be considered a defence for students because it defines both the limits of permissible conduct and what constitutes an offence.

In response to the charge of double jeopardy, Swan said: "There will very often be double jeopardy. If you become a doctor or lawyer or dentist or join any professional association you certainly have to satisfy the standards of both the criminal code and also of the profession."

He went to state: "It may be thought that once a student has been punished in the criminal courts, nothing further should be done."

His concern was with those offences which might not be taken into the courts but which still require the deliberation of some legal body.

Barry Weisleder, speaking as a representative of the Committee to Repeal the Discipline Code, endeavored to discover the motivation behind the discipline code.

Problems in the world economy he contended, have created uncertainty in the economy of universities. Cutbacks in staff and certain programs and fee hikes are all symptomatic of the economic dilemma, according to Weisleder.

The Varsity - Steven Mahas

He maintained the discipline code is an attempt of the administration to prevent further opposition to these cutbacks.

"In order to introduce the cutbacks in face of the possible opposition that will occur round them," he said, "it is necessary to have the mechanism to deal with that opposition."

He went on to assert: "The university carries out a violent practice every day of the year through its investments in imperialist corporations that ravage Africa, and South America and South East Asia."

Directorate ponders athletic proposals

By CHRIS ROBINSON

Discussion at Tuesday's Athletic Directorate meeting centred around men's director Dalt White's proposal for the governing structure of the new Department of Physical Education, Athletics and Recreation.

In line with the last meeting's stand supporting complete integration of the School of PHE and the other programs, the proposed structure was unitary.

At the top level, the academic affairs committee would have a PHE Council reporting to it, and internal affairs an Athletic and Recreation Council.

The top levels were easily accepted, but the lower operating levels received considerable criticism.

They suggested four divisions: men's and women's intercollegiate athletics separately, recreation and fitness co-ed, and the School of PHE co-ed.

Subordinate to intercollegiate sports were the men's and women's intramural sports.

Student member Rodger Wright pointed out this system would tend to perpetuate sexual segregation instead of promoting the integration recommended by the task force on athletics.

Professor Ann Hewett, women's director, suggested it would be more appropriate to integrate the divisions and handle the problems of sex-differentiated sports competition at a lower sub-department level.

Professor Juri Daniel, director of the School of PHE, argued the purpose of any governing structure is the provision of certain functions, and it should be arranged on that basis.

He suggested intercollegiate, intramural sports and recreation, fitness and non-academic instruction, and academic instruction as the four most appropriate functions.

Hewett then raised another problem with the observation that the executive committee, which would be over these divisions and consisting of their heads, would thus out-vote the professional faculty.

The best interests of the School of PHE might thus be overwhelmed by lay interests.

Frank Iacobucci interjected the inevitable note of conservatism by remarking the only continuing group on campus is the staff, and their interests and values should be foremost in his consideration.

The directorate came to no decisive conclusion. Daniel moved that it send a letter to the Fisher committee on governing structures stating it supported complete integration immediately, and was considering various structures. The motion passed unopposed.

The members then passed on to the burning issue of the day — the annual Athletic Dinner arrangements.

Vice-chairman Bruce Durno informed the enthralled members of the bitter debates in the dinner committee over the choice between pot and prime roasts (pot won), and the momentous decision to include mashed potatoes on the menu.

He expected the cost this year would be slightly below last year's $2,300, since the committee had opted for a cheaper dinner.

As the last cookie crumbs and sips of tea disappeared, the members rubber-stamped a list of bronze T awards and adjourned.

'Plumbers' make three classifications

Gov Council attempts to plug security leaks

By PETER STROKE

In an effort to plug the leaky ship of state at Simcoe Hall, Governing Council is to be asked tomorrow to ratify a document calling for strictly defined release of information from the university administration.

The recommendation to be presented from council's executive committee calls for classification of all Governing Council and committee documents into one of three categories: confidential, restricted and unclassified.

The confidentiality guidelines also outline a hierarchy of who and under what circumstances declassification of documents may occur for U of T's ruling body.

In addition, guidelines for closed and in camera meetings of the council's five committees are spelled out as well as detailed instructions about the release of any information from any closed or in camera meetings.

While the confidentiality guidelines have been floating around the Governing Council for quite some time as an advisory document, the move tomorrow will make the guidelines the official rule for classifying Simcoe Hall documents.

Without once mentioning "executive privilege" or "national security," the executive committee's recommendation says the rubber stamp shall be wielded as follows:

"Documents will be classified, in the first instance, by the originator, or the appropriate committee secretary in consultation with the committee chairman.

"This classification may be modified by the committee, by the executive committee (which meets behind closed doors), by the Governing Council or by its chairman.

"Holders of classified documents will be notified of any modification in the classification."

Confidential university documents "may not be discussed with persons other than (Governing) Council members or the senior administrative officers attached to the committees." However a confidential document may be restricted to members of a committee of council alone.

Restricted documents "may be discussed by members within their particular constituency, but not made public."

However, the recommendation says it is "anticipated" restricted documents may be de-classified at the time of the following Governing Council meeting.

Even so-called "unclassified" documents are not so open. They are to be made public except "it is probably undesirable" the "press" debate them prior to the issue being raised in committee or Governing Council.

In camera and closed committee meetings are to be treated in much the same way, with documents and decisions not to be made public — they are to be classified instead — until the executive committee releases them, the committee releases them, or the committee chairman releases them.

The executive committee recommendation does carry the following rider, however, without saying how it is to be implemented:

"Classified documents will be marked either restricted or confidential."

"The number of documents so labelled will be kept to an absolute minimum and such documents will be de-classified, when appropriate, as expeditiously as possible and the holders of the documents so informed."

Blackmail charged; Conway 'talks'; students to rally

So it's down to the wire. The administration dug in its heels this week and negotiations with student representatives have broken off. Charging "bad faith" and "blackmail" the students who were negotiating are claiming they are sick of the two-faced administration policy.

Monday we asked Jill Conway, the chief negotiator for the administration, what her views of the discipline code were. With her knowledge, we tape recorded the conversation lest anyone maintain the Varsity is "just misquoting again."

When asked about her policy toward the code, Conway replied: "My position is that we have had a series of meetings to try and establish whether there was any possibility of implementing the non-academic code, portions of it and developing appropriate structures for it. Those meetings seemed to indicate as of today (Monday) that there's very little likelihood of agreement being reached, particularly on the very contentious area in the clauses in section 3E and F which relate to a "lawful order". And I shall be conveying the result of this morning's meeting to the president and to the chairman of the Governing Council and they'll act on it accordingly."

Conway added: "I've always felt that it might not be possible to reach agreement on the non-academic sections of the code and that we could then only proceed with the academic section which I regard as tremendously important to the functioning of the university. If we can only do that the Caput will have to be kept for non-academic offences.

although I believe everybody wishes that we could get a functioning non-academic code and structures that would allow doing away with the Caput."

When asked what she would say about the discipline issue at the Governing Council meeting, Conway replied: "I have no idea at the moment whether the subject of discipline will be on the agenda. As far as I know there will only be the motion that was passed by the executive. As far as I know that would be the only subject that will be discussed and whether I will be called upon to speak about it or not I don't know. If I were I would explain the circumstances in which it was developed."

We weren't able to reach president Evans for our questions so we asked Conway what the president's position was. Just as we had expected, Conway was not prepared to speak for the president, although she had indicated that she would be consulting with him.

The question of a discipline code should be decided once and for all at tomorrow's Governing Council meeting.

The council must not pass the executive committee motion to postpone a decision on the code until March. The administration is simply stalling until students are too tied up with exams and essays in late March to protest the code.

We must stand up for our basic rights at the Governing Council tomorrow. Attend the 4 pm rally in Sid Smith foyer and come with us to the Governing Council Show. (You may be disciplined if you don't.)

"As I have repeatedly stated, reason is the means by which changes will be made within this university."

Official 'Haist' rules for Klue Klutz Kode game

Rules of the Klue Klutz Kode Game, made in Haist:

1. Object of the game is to get your diploma by moving your token along the board to the diploma square.

2. Students must use loaded dice. U of T administrators and faculty may use honest dice at their sole discretion.

3. Any number may play each player rolling the dice in turn and moving his/her token the indicated number of squares. However female administrators must have their husband's written permission to play unless they are unmarried in which case they must first get a husband. All students must play.

4. Any player landing on a Kode Kard square must draw a Kode Kard and obey the instructions. However, administration and faculty members may decline to obey if they wish.

5. The first player to land on the Edukated Idiot (Diploma) square wins. However any student player who overshoots that square must start over. On the other hand, any faculty or administration member who overshoots the square still wins, because he/she is granted immunity because of the Haist rules.

6. Rolling doubles. Faculty or administration members get a free extra turn rolling doubles. Student players lose a turn.

7. A student player who lands on a square allowing his/her to jump his/her token forward must declare the words "I'm selling out" before jumping or he/she returns to the "Start of Student Movement" square.

GSU president Watson quits after dispute with council

By BOB BETTSON

Cliff Watson, Graduate Student Union president, resigned yesterday following a dispute at a GSU council last week about the amount of time the president should spend on his job.

Elections are to be held February 11, 12 and 13 for the president for the period until May 1. Nominations are to open tomorrow for a week.

Watson resigned following a dispute in the Thursday council meeting over the raising of the salary for next year's president. Watson, who has worked long hours on the job, supported the creation of a full time position for the president because of the work involved.

Others on the council, including former president Wendy LeBlanc, opposed the move, saying the president is only a part-time job, demanding a few hours a week.

Even though the council passed the motion, Watson still resigned. He could not be reached last night for comment.

However GSU vice-president Brian Mossop said last night Watson resigned because he thought a significant number of people on council had a different conception of the job of president than he did.

The new salary passed by the council will be $3,000 per year, according to Mossop. He added he would not run for president.

Mossop said the resignation did not indicate a split on policy matters within the GSU but reflected the split on the role of the president.

Watson will continue until the new president takes office. He is presently a student in the Faculty of Management Studies.

An active president, Watson has been involved in negotiations on the discipline code as well as working on the staffing issue.

He did not resign over the money but the principle of the job of the president, which he sees as a full time job.

After the resignation the council reaffirmed the motion calling for the raise

Anatomy of a Root

Fine Canadian Leathers
The soft skins are naturally finished, so in Roots you'll look as good as you feel. And because Roots are designed and made right here in Canada, you needn't pay through the nose for your feet.

Rocker Sole

In a natural stride, weight moves from the heel, along the outer side of the foot then diagonally across to the big toe, which springs you off on your next step. Roots rocker sole helps this shift in weight, making every foot step just a little less tiring.

Supported Arch

The city sidewalk can be a real arch-enemy. And fallen arches hurt. Roots are contoured to support the arch and the small recess between the balls of your feet.

Recessed Heel

Walk on sand and your heel will leave the deepest part of your footprint. In natural walking, most of your weight lands on your heel. Conventional shoes—tilt you forward and change your basic posture. In Roots, your heel sinks into a comfortable recess, giving you a natural walk on any kind of surface.

Future of Union Station to be decided today

By JANE WATERSTON

Union Station should be saved in its entirety as a transportation centre even if this would stop Metro Centre's plans for development, argued Ward 10 alderman William Kilbourn at Monday night's meeting of the Union Station Committee in the council chamber at City Hall.

Kilbourn's opinion was heavily endorsed by the 400 people who attended the session to demonstrate the extent of public support for the preservation of the 45-year-old transportation terminal.

City council will be asked today to include as a term in its development agreement with Metro Centre Developments Limited, a company jointly owned by Canadian National and Canadian Pacific, that all of Union Station be preserved and that the station continue as the heart of the transportation centre.

Monday's meeting resolved to pressure Mayor Crombie and the other members of council with phone calls and telegrams demanding the preservation of the station.

Much of the evening's discussion revolved around the importance of Union Station in the life and health of Toronto.

Pierre Berton spoke about the "imposing elegance" of the structure and stressed the importance of the facade in the maintenance of the historical texture and the stature of the city.

Jack Diamond, of Diamond and Meyers Architects, said Union Station and the 187 acres around it provide a breathing space in the heart of the city, and the building is a symbol of the health of Toronto's core area.

He is convinced that the moving of the terminal south would be the result of real estate motives rather than transportation necessity, and the whole scheme is evidence of the "projectitis" of the development pressure, which is presently enthralling the city.

Public objectives should be established, said Diamond, before private gain makes its way. The city needs assurance that the area will be developed for the public as a whole and not just for private interest.

Ward 7 Alderman John Sewell spoke on the political mechanisms which would be involved in the saving of the station.

of the structure from the members of the council at today's meeting are crucial. The aldermen must, he stressed, be pressured into their vote. Sewell claimed the saving of the building is neither legally impossible nor economically unfeasible, a statement which elicited catcalls from ward 5 Alderman Colin Vaughan.

Sewell said Metro Centre should be forced to adapt its plans to Union Station and not vice versa.

Monday night's meeting requested that city council make a feasibility study on the preservation of the station.

Metro Centre has proposed a major development for the 187 acres bounded by Yonge, the Gardiner Expressway, Bathurst and Front Street.

One of the basics of its proposal is to remove the train servicing yards to Mimico, and then to move the through train yards south from their present location to just north of the Gardiner Expressway.

Concurrent with the shift in tracks is the creation of a new transportation terminal to the south of the present Union Station, thereby making the station redundant.

Metro Centre is not interested in saving Union Station.

It has been pressured, however, into a proposal which would preserve the Great Hall—one-fifth of the station—at the expense of the city. Saving just the Great Hall would mean preserving it merely as a museum piece.

for people who walk on this earth...

If you've walked barefoot on sand or soil you know how great it is. Your heels sink low and your feet embrace the earth. Then you put on your shoes, return to the city, and become another concrete fighter... but the concrete always wins. You yearn for the earth that lies buried beneath the city.

The Earth Shoe is the first shoe in history with the heel lower than the sole... this helps return you to nature though you are forced to live in a cement-coated world. The Earth Shoe's patented design gently guides you to a more erect and graceful walk, and reduces fatigue and the aches and pains caused by our hard-surfaced city.

For men and women in shoes, sandals, sabots and boots. From $23.50 to $42.50. Brochure available.

Farmworkers launch petition against Dominion

By TOM GRAND

Representatives of the United Farmworkers Union (UFW) have opened an information booth at Sid Smith Hall this week in an effort to launch a petition campaign against Dominion Stores.

The UFW representatives say the only thing which will convince the California and Arizona grape and lettuce growers to recognize their union is a loss of sales.

If the Toronto supermarkets—Torontoians are the third largest consumers of California table grapes in the world—refuse to sell California grapes and lettuce the growers will feel that much more pressure to accede to the UFW demands.

Since Dominion Stores are the largest grape outlet in Toronto, the UFW is asking the people of Toronto to refuse to shop in any Dominion Store.

If Dominion was to suffer a significant drop in sales then it and other chains would be forced to take grapes and iceberg head lettuce off their shelves. The UFW is not boycotting leaf lettuce.

For U of T students this would mean avoiding shopping at the Dominion Stores situated at Bloor and Robert Streets and on Balmuto Street.

Presently pickets are operating at 25 Dominion Stores in the Metro Toronto area at various intervals during the week.

The pickets started in November and have been going ever since.

Last week, according to Luke Gambo campus UFW representative, one of the picketers—a U of T student was arrested at the King and Dufferin Dominion Store by an off-duty Toronto Policeman who had been hired by Dominion at $8.50 per hour.

The Toronto Police Association informed The Varsity that although they were unaware of such an incident it may have occurred since officers are allowed to take on extra work especially on weekends in anticipation of heavier automobile traffic around the stores.

In such a case if an individual broke the law while picketing it would be the office's duty to make an arrest.

A representative of Dominion Stores added that as far he knew Dominion had not hired any off duty police in response to the picketing of their stores.

The California Grape boycott has had a long and painful history.

In 1962 Cesar Chavez began to slowly organize farm workers in the US to bring about changes in degrading working conditions.

In 1965 the UFW headed by Chavez began a grape boycott in California in order to overcome exploitation of farm workers by the grape growers.

Five years later the growers came to terms with the UFW and signed a three-year contract. However, in the spring of 1973 the contract expired and the growers have attempted to crush the UFW.

According to Gamboa the farm workers have lost all the gains made under the old 1970 contract.

Working conditions are deplorable, child labor laws continue to be violated, workers can be forced to work up to 14 hours per day, drinking water is not supplied in the fields, there is no protection against pesticide poisoning, and the infamous labor contractor system has been re-introduced.

Gamboa likened the labor contractor system to the overseers on the slave plantations of the Old American South.

They are used by the growers to do the hiring of farm workers, they alone choose who shall be allowed to work and in return the workers must repay them with special favors or their wages.

Gamboa said he and 30 farm workers along with three UFW organizers will remain in Toronto until the boycott is successful and the growers are prepared to sit down and negotiate new contracts.

UFW organizers work as volunteers with the union providing a basic living rate of $5.00 per week for everything else—room and board, office space—they rely on the support of those in sympathy with their cause.

The UFW claims widespread support from the labor movement and has received funds from various unions such as the steel, auto, and the plumbers' unions.

The NDP as a whole and individual members of the Conservative and Liberal parties have also pledged their support.

Numerous church organizations actively support the UFW and have given their representatives food and clothing. The campus Newman Centre is providing the UFW with office space on their third floor.

Math whiz beats computers

By DICK BROWN

A mathematics whiz from India wants to challenge U of T's computers to a contest, and if past experience in 120 counties is any indication, the computer center better get its gadgetry in top shape.

Shakuntala Devi has an uncanny ability to calculate remarkably large numbers quickly—faster than the computers she has challenged—and just as accurate.

Her reason for wanting to challenge U of T's computer? She says she wants to prove people can control and outstrip the machines.

"I want to spread the beauty of mathematics around the world," she says.

As a sample, a Varsity math hack spent 15 minutes behind closed doors raising the number, 1,822, to the third power.

Presented only with the 10-digit answer, she pointed out an error in calculation, which was corrected, and promptly wrote the correct cube root of the 10-digit number—6,048,464,348 is the cube of 1,822.

Devi claims to have beaten every computer she has been up against so far, including her most recent performance at the University of Ottawa where the head of the mathematics department threw a binary computation at her and the computer.

It was her first attempt at binary calculations—previously she had only done base 10—and she beat Ottawa's computer even though she says she was not having one of her best days.

She's also beaten the computers at Carleton University and Algonquin College, she says, but her proudest people-over-machine victory was in Australia when she beat the Utecom computer at the University of New South Wales.

"That's one of the fastest computers in the world," Devi says.

Adding, subtracting, multiplying, dividing, square roots, cube roots and raising sometimes astronomical numbers to seemingly astronomical powers are all part of her lightning fast repertoire.

In addition, given any date going back 4,000 years, she can give the day of the week, as well as giving the day of the week for a future date. "It's a gift," she says of her ability. "I was born with it. It first showed when I was three years old."

Devi does not calculate the computation out in the traditional public school longhand method. Rather, she says, the correct answer just pops into her head.

A correct computation, she indicates, "is a complete whole, a living being." An incorrect computation "has a flaw, like a tooth missing."

She has travelled around the world visiting 120 countries. This being her first trip to Canada. The only countries left are Russia, China, Mexico, Bolivia and Portugal.

THE GOVERNING COUNCIL

Subcommittee on Methods of Selection of Students for Possible Participation on Tenure Committees

The Subcommittee of the Academic Affairs Committee to consider mechanisms for selection of students for possible participation on tenure committees has begun to meet and plans to report by mid-February, 1974, to the Academic Affairs Committee. The Academic Affairs Committee will then consider the principle of such representation.

The Subcommittee invites individuals or groups to submit comments or briefs to be directed specifically towards the mechanisms, rather than the principle, of such representation.

Submissions should be directed to the Secretary of the Governing Council, Room 106, Simcoe Hall, to be received no later than February 1st, 1974.

'Madwoman of Chaillot' is antiquated

University Playhouse opened its latest production Monday night, The Madwoman of Chaillot, Giradoux's fable on the evils of money. Adhering strictly to the somewhat outdated script, the production sacrificed the potential that a modern interpretation could have realized.

Giradoux's farce, a moralistic appraisal of the "destructive wish" of man to accumulate wealth, begins with a meeting of entrepreneurs intent on a corporate venture that lacks a name and a product. An avant-garde prospector (Bruce Larson) attired in elevator heels and shimmering black leather pants and jacket supplies the name and the scheme; excavation of oil from the land beneath Paris. The president (Joe Gibbons) bemoans the "human sentimentality" that might block such an undertaking. "How can you do business with that?" he complains.

Enter the heroine, the Countess, proprietor of the local cafe, benefactor for the street children (who resemble the Haight-Asbury flock) and the panacea for the greed that the mercantile man inflicts on the world. Resolved to rectify the world's woes (make the pigeons fly again, let the flowers bloom, etc.), she plots to lure these debauched dupes into the endless labyrinth of the Paris sewers.

After a proxy trial and more homilies, the money grubbers are directed from the countess' basement into the endless daze of desire.

Freed from malevolent money, Beauty returns to the world. All the members of the coterie thank the Countess, even the deaf mute who adds the appropriate platitude, "Out of the heart of darkness comes the light."

To cement the union of beauty and the world, the Countess employs the young couple (a reformed suicide and the Barmaid) to kiss and concludes the production with an aphorism worthy of Aesop or Grimm, "Well, there we are and the world is saved."

The audience that sits for two hours watching Giradoux's farce, however, seldom experiences salvation. The flat character portrayals inherent in the script command only a glimmer of interest despite the actors' attempts. Ingenuity and vigor, ingredients - needed to enliven and energize the farce, remain obscured.

Giradoux's script explains part of the problem. The dated script reads like a Saturday morning cartoon or a Sunday morning Christopher Hour show that attempts to elucidate the evils of greed and desire and show how money spawns the two. But the one-liners that dot the script seldom garnered laughs. The humor failed because the play, perhaps unique and interesting in Giradoux's era, has become anachronistic. The evils of money are preached to us in our youth; by university the whole idea becomes rather trite.

Skai Leja as the Countess provided the sole antidote to the viewers' weariness. Despite an apparent artificial strain to emphasize each line, she made her madness (Giradoux's label for the romantic eccentric) interesting and palpable. She reminded one of your biddy old aunt who holds court with her cats and serves them tea each afternoon at exactly 4:10.

But the production failed to transpose an antiquated farce with obsolete theme into an entertaining and lively modern production. The frills added (such as the Muzak and hippie attire) are merely frills and can't save the Mad Woman.

Over the week-end the Varsity basketball team played two games. The first game was at Queen's and the final score was Toronto 71 Queen's 51. The game was fairly close in the first half with Toronto taking a 31-26 lead. In the second half Queen's opened up fast and took a one point lead with five minutes gone. Varsity then opened up a large lead of 20 points and the game stayed that way until the end. Top scorers for Varsity were Randy Filinski 17, Glenn Scott 11, Brian Skyvington 10, and Doug Fox and Avo Albo eight a piece. The second game was played at RMC and the score was Toronto 65 RMC 50. This game was a loosely-played contest with Toronto gradually pulling ahead with 15 points. The Blues were led by Bill Birnbaum 12, Fox 10, Skyvington nine, and Doug Baker with eight. The two wins leaves the Blues with a 7-1 record for 14 points. This puts the Blues in first place in the Eastern Section. Ottawa is 6-1 while Laurentian is 6-2. In another important game Laurentian edged Ottawa Gee-Gees 68-66. Both teams are challenging Blues for first. In Windsor, the Lancers shafted powerful Waterloo Warriors 94-79 as both teams fight for the lead in the section. Sport Magazine's 1973 Man of the Year was won by Secretariat, the horse that won the Triple Crown. Among the other hopefuls he beat out were Billie Jean King and Olga Korbout. The UCLA basketball team finally lost their 88 game winning streak when Notre Dame edged them 71-70 last Saturday. Previous to this defeat, the Bruins last lost Jan. 30, 1971 when UC Santa Barbara dropped them 75-61. Revenge could be quick, however, for coach John Wooden's troops because they meet the undefeated (10-1) Notre Dame team again this coming Saturday. Controversial sportswriter Leonard Scheeter, who co-authored Ball Four with Jim Bouton, wrote The Jocks, a blistering expose of professional athletics and was sports editor of LOOK, died this week. He was 47. York beat Brock 16-3 Saturday for their tenth win of the year. It moved them to within a point of Toronto in the hockey standings but the Blues have a game in hand. The U of T women's swim team competed in an invitational meet at Waterloo over the weekend. First year student Jane Wright lead the team, setting three meet records. US champions Arizona State Sun Devils won the meet, followed by Michigan State. U of T bettered the other nine Canadian teams. At the end of four games in women's inter-faculty curling, SMC stands first with 46.5 points, followed closely by Dents with 45 points, Pharm with 38 points, New with 35 points, Vic I with 32 points, Nsg I with 29 points, SMC with 27, Nsg II with 24, Erin with 19 and Vic II with 11. Coming up are the OWIAA semi-finals in curling. The U of T team will be competing in them at Sudbury, Jan. 24 and 25... with hopes for a win. Two teams from the University of Toronto competed Saturday in an annual Humber curling bonspiel. The competition consisted of two ten end games with the top team winning a trophy. The women's intercollegiate curling team played well in both of their games. In the first, U of T defeated the Acton business girls 15-8. The second game was against a Bramalea team skipped by Donna Hlady. This contest was also won by the consistent U of T team by a score of 13-7. This team will be competing in the preliminary intercollegiate competition this Thursday and Friday in Sudbury. The finals will be held at the Guelph Country Club Feb. 15-16. The team is skipped by Mary Bullen with Nancy Slocombe as vice-skip, Heather Gillespie second and Joan Ayre playing lead. Linda Piuini is managing the team. The second U of T rink also fared well in the first game with a 16-1 victory. The second game resulted in a 13-5 loss to the Richmond Hill team. This team was skipped by Shirley Morrison with Linda Piumi as vice, Janice Graham as second and Sandra Gagnon playing lead. Both teams were ably coached by M. Mills. In the over-all standings, the intercollegiate team finished four points behind the winning Richmond Hill rink. Shirley Morrison's rink also finished well up in the standings in fifth place. A total of 16 rinks competed in the bonspiel including the Toronto teams. . . . Women's interfac hockey is well underway, with 20 teams playing in two divisions. St. Mike's leads the eight teams in the competitive league with six points in three games. Close behind is Erindale with four points in three games. In the recreational league, there are 12 teams with UC - Music and St Mike's fighting for the lead. . . . during the weekend, the men's fencing team entered the York University invitational tournament. The epic team of John Roth, Dave Hamer, and Wing Nip were sharp with their points and came away with the championship.

The Varsity—Lawrence Clarke

On a semi-breakaway, St. Mike's forward unleashes a slapshot at the UC net.

Trent was second and RMC third in this event. The foil competitions ended with three teams tied with the most number of victories, but Carleton was awarded the championship because they had the most individual victories. The U of T team of Bernard Tsui, Abu Nazir and Bob O'Hoski were forced to settle for second place with RMC third. . . . during the weekend cross-country meet, U of T defeated Laurentian, Queen's and RMC. Doug Garfield came second with a time of 35:07 out of 28 skiers. All the Blues turned in good performances: Ken Sidey came fifth (37:48), Rich Sutcliffe twelfth and Dave McClyment sixteenth. Tom Best had an excellent time for the first part of the race, but he couldn't finish unfortunately because his equipment broke. . . . The record for consecutive situps is 18,000. . . We can still use some help at the sports desk. Chilean disputes Berrigan

MONTREAL (CUPD) — Rev. Daniel Berrigan advocated non-violence at a Loyola University panel discussion, but few people seemed persuaded.

A Chilean refugee and many of the students in the audience rejected the philosophy, arguing that it could not lead to social change in the under-developed countries.

One student described non-violence as "an old fashioned, useless concept." He said non-violence would never oust the military junta in Chile.

Nor had Gandhi's non-violence saved India from violence in its fight for freedom, he said.

A black student from South Africa described the oppression of her people and said only violence could lead to freedom. "You cannot defeat the ruling white government and the international corporations with your arms folded," she said.

Berrigan spent two years in a U.S. jail for antiwar activities. He said he had no solutions for oppressed peoples but "moral consistency" led him to reject violence.

America has got the runs, or at least a run on toilet paper.

With nary a reference to the Watergate scandal, the three leading toilet paper producers in the US have announced an allocation system due to panic buying by consumers.

Citing unfounded rumors of a shortage of the TP, the Scott Paper Company has brought in a national distribution system of TP to prevent shortages.

Procter and Gamble, another biggie in the TP world, has exhumed an obscure company rule limiting toilet paper orders to a 30-day supply.

This was done, said a company, to meet normal customer needs. No reference was made to abnormal needs.

However, the Scott spokesman says his company's allocation system was designed to deal with abnormal consumer demand.

Meanwhile, the TP czars at Kimberly-Clark, were sitting on any ideas of strict rationing saying orders are being limited depending on various circumstances, but, alas, those circumstances were not revealed.

LOOKING FOR A COMPANY WITH ROOM AT THE TOP? COMPUTEL'S GOT IT.

The Career Opportunity

Computel is a dynamic young company which pioneered the whole concept of remote access computer services in Canada. We are seeking to augment our people resources by employing a select number of graduates in the science and applied science disciplines for training and development in all aspects of the computing services field. Candidates interested in exploring this opportunity should expect to graduate in 1974 in computer science, mathematics, physics, chemistry, or engineering in the top 10% of their class. They need not have extensive computer oriented training, though background of this kind would obviously be an asset. They should, however, have a real interest in developing a computer based career, leading to positions of responsibility, either technical or administrative, in the management of large scale computer centres, in systems programming, in large systems design, in nation-wide on-line business systems and time-sharing systems, or in marketing and sales. The opportunities are clearly unlimited, exciting and rewarding for people of outstanding ability and an ambition to progress in this particular field of technology.

The Company

Computel Systems Ltd. is a publicly owned Canadian company headquartered in Ottawa with branch offices in Toronto and Montreal. In January, 1971, it acquired a wholly owned subsidiary, Information Systems Design in Oakland, California. Since the company's inception in 1967, Computel has provided computing services in both the public and private sectors in Canada and the United States.

A rapidly expanding company, Computel's Head Office in Ottawa maintains one of the largest assemblies of data processing power in Canada. Computer hardware in the Ottawa centre includes a Univac 1108, an IBM 360/65 and an IBM 370/165 soon to be replaced by an IBM 370/168 computer with its 'virtual storage' operating system.

The Training Program

Selected candidates will be given a thorough and professionally directed training course, with both theoretical and practical instruction, in all phases of computing expertise. The course will include:—

Computer Operations: training in the operation of printers, card readers, tape and disk drives, data control techniques, card handling practices and printer out-put control; instruction in tape library management, computer maintenance of large-scale, multi-hardware systems, computer communications, console operation, remote batch terminal operation, and computer centre environment requirements.

Systems Programming: Manufacturers' supplied courses at Canadian or U.S. centres on the features of IBM and Univac system control programs such as OS, VS, TSO, Exec VIII, TIP and DMS 1100, as well as such high level languages as FORTRAN and COBOL.

Applications Programs: training in such applications as Data Base Management Systems, mathematical sub-routines, MARK IV, and TOTAL.

Marketing and Sales: outside sales training course, and direct field exposure to the computer services marketplace.

Upon completion of the course, candidates will be assigned to regular positions, as indicated by personal abilities and preferences, in computer centre management, systems programming, applications programming, or marketing and sales. Opportunities for further growth and advancement will be open to all career personnel on the basis of ability and performance.

Salary and Benefits

Computel offers a better than average starting salary and generous fringe benefits. Salaries are regularly reviewed and adjusted for both cost of living and merit.

Recruiting Procedure

Interested candidates should send letters of application and complete resumes, including academic class standing no later than February 1, 1974 to Mr. R.T. Lane, Executive Vice-President, Administration, Computel Systems Ltd., 1200 St. Laurent Blvd., Ottawa, Ontario, K1K 3B8. All applications will be acknowledged, and those selected for interview so notified, prior to the arrival of the recruiting team on campus.

Instruction in archery is free

Are you interested in the noble sport of archery?

If so, free instruction is available to you in the Benson Building by one of their staff, Ellen Alston. She is a certified American instructor for the American Archery Association.

All the equipment is provided, and according to Alston, it's some of the finest available. Alston also speaks highly of facilities in the Benson Building.

"The archery range is one of the best in Canada," she said. "We have permanent quarters with everything marked out but other clubs have to spend an hour just setting up 100 pound targets in a gym and then taking them down later."

The instructional classes are Wednesday from 7:30 to 9:30. They are held in the archery range in the Benson Building and are coeducational.

Other instruction classes are also available: Monday 11 a.m. and 1 p.m., Wednesday 11 a.m. and 1 p.m., and Thursday at noon.

The Varsity—Paul Deshaigh

The Benson Building is offering free archery classes.

Gymnastics team has improved

The men's varsity gymnastics team travelled to Kingston on the weekend to compete with four other universities in the second OUAA invitational meet. Toronto, who trailed York by 28 points in an earlier competition, were much improved during this tournament and trailed first place York by only nine points.

This is the strongest men's team Toronto has fielded since York began its domination of gymnastics six years ago. Steve Mitruk, best senior gymnast in Canada and Peter Mazarro are new and welcome additions to the U of T team. Mitruk paced the competition with a total score just short of 51 points.

Competing coach Hans Frick, out with injuries for a year and a half, had a good day. Toronto also got good performances from veterans Brian Euler, John Kelly, Rick Jeyman, captain Bryan Alcock and rookies John Fair and Rick Collins. Arnold Bishop did not compete because of an injury.

They travel to Ottawa this weekend for an invitational meet.

Federated colleges don't need Code

Among all the financial and academic considerations being discussed in the three federated colleges — Victoria, St. Michael's and Trinity — there is one issue that has been the least considered with reference to president John Evans' plans for centralization on the campus.

While implementation of Evans' October working paper on the role of the colleges would bring the colleges into an academic and budgetary central control from the Faculty of Arts and Sciences and Simcoe Hall respectively, the plan would also bring students at the three colleges in line with a behaviour code which appears to be more stringent than discipline procedures inside the colleges.

Each of the federated colleges has traditionally been autonomous when it comes to internal discipline problems.

A disagreement between a student and a teacher at any one of the colleges, or even a sit-in at any office on a federated campus is handled by the disciplinary body set up in the charters of the college.

The three colleges each have a separate Caput.

At St. Michael's, the SMC Caput consists of both students and faculty. It has been called, according to SMC dean of men Rick Hayward, only once in the last six years, the result being the students wanted to come down harder on a case of dope dealing in the dorms than the faculty members.

The offenders were warned and suspended for a short time with another short period of probation.

The Vic Caput has not been called in so long that no one seems to know whether students are represented, but a phone answer at Vic's student union said: "I would doubt it."

Inside the colleges even "offenses" such as a sit-in mentioned above would probably be treated more lightly than the possible reaction under the university behaviour code.

SMC's Hayward admitted, when offered the hypothetical example of a sit-in at the office of SMC president John Kelly, that Rev. Kelly would probably pack up his files and move to another office until agreement was reached.

This sort of treatment would most probably continue inside the federated colleges in the areas of non-academic offenses, if they were to remain as federated colleges.

The behaviour code specifically states that for non-academic offenses, which include supplying false information to the university, destroying university records, damaging university materials and property or disrupting "authorized activities" the code will have to be passed by the "appropriate bodies in the federated universities and colleges before it will apply to members of these institutions."

It can not be said for certain, but it would appear from the tone of responses to the Evans' work paper on other questions that the colleges would like to handle the discipline for these offenses, should they take place inside the college.

Presently, however, any offense,

Students won't be able to pound on Simcoe Hall's doors if the Code gets through. The protestors above were clamoring for open stack access to the Roberts.

academic or non-academic, committed by a student of a federated college on university property would most likely be handled under university discipline.

Yet this is one grey area in the entire discipline question which few people inside the federated colleges can shed any light on.

It comes down to one question: where does college jurisdiction end and university jurisdiction start?

College spokesmen agree internal problems can be solved internally, but also admit that in special circumstances, usually at the request of either plaintiff or defendant, a problem could go before a university tribunal.

The entire discipline picture changes, however, given the ramifications of the Evans work paper, which would make all students of the federated colleges students of the entire university, and bring them under the sanctions of the university discipline code for both academic and non-academic offenses.

This movement makes inoperative the clause in U of T's discipline code referring to the colleges' right to try it's own non-academic offenses.

Given the response of the student unions of the federated colleges to the discipline code, it would appear the centralization plans are causing even more worries in the area of discipline.

Each of the colleges' student unions have come out in opposition to the code

Code history grows, principles forgotten

Administrators realized after the 1972 library occupations at U of T a new method of dealing with discipline was needed. This has culminated in the Conway-Cadario code.

President John Evans found his ideal man in Paul Cadario, an undergraduate aspiring to a Rhodes Scholarship.

Cadario was quickly named chairman of the internal affairs committee, against the wishes of many student caucus. This was the committee which would formulate a new code.

Cadario was ideal for the task. A fourth year Engineer, new president John Evans once called him one of the five people whose advice he relied on the most heavily in running the university.

Code Formulated

Quietly the council started on its deliberations.

It invited submissions from student organizations and other groups. But the interest wasn't there. Cadario proceeded to scrap the Campbell report although it had been implemented at Trinity College and was working well. He believed a code must be acceptable to the faculty.

The code finally surfaced last March when the focus on campus was a math occupation. It was tougher than expected, outlawing any undue disruptions and containing tough new blanket prohibitions on disobeying lawful orders and conspiracy to commit an offense.

The administration also had an ideal co-author for the code, newly appointed vice-president of internal affairs Jill Conway.

Together the two wrote with the aid of law professor John Swan what many students have called an "extremely repressive code" which institutionalizes tough penalties, and coopts students to sit in judgement on rules they did not make.

Double jurisdiction and stringent regulations on academic offenses were also trademarks of what is now known as the Conway-Cadario code.

Student organizations were slow in reacting and the then new SAC president Bob Anderson, elected on the staffing issue, was slow in reacting, and then started to negotiate.

Three large student organizations had reservations about this code but decided to negotiate on amendments.

While Students were Away . . .

The student organizations were in a bind. There had been no campus wide discussion on discipline and the Governing Council was not receptive to amendments. The code had not been published in final form until af-fled. His line was to offer a student interpretation of the code, which would serve as a precedent for future prosecution.

He was quoted in the Varsity on October 3 saying: "We can live with the code."

But events reversed Anderson's policy and the SAC executive and finally SAC supported the Moses stand and started a campaign to reject the code, following on their successful staffing referendum.

The belated organizing attempt was successful. Virtually every student organization rejected the code and opposition mounted.

The administration Backs Down

The Governing Council meeting was packed but the administration had already backed down. Internal affairs chairwoman Marnie Paikin told SAC she would offer a motion to the council postponing the passing of structures to implement the code.

The drama was lacking but the packed meeting discussed discipline for an hour as students jeered administration attempts to rationalize the code. It was delayed with the promise responsible amendments would be accepted.

However this was clearly not a victory. Students continued to organize setting up a petition campaign and a drive to mobilize more student opposition. The Governing Council meeting today was the focus for organizing efforts.

Negotiations of a sort started last week between SAC, other student officials and the administration.

Jill Conway and John Evans shuffled the students back and forth in an exhausting series of meetings making concessions and later revoking them.

The teeth were removed from a Conway motion to the executive committee stating discipline should not be implemented without consensus.

The negotiators discovered student dissent and finally they gave up after negotiations yielded few, if any, concessions.

This is Cadario. He helped give us the Code.

The Governing Council, undaunted by student protest, decided to pass the code without students on campus, ignoring APUS, SAC and GSU. It was shoved through on June 21. The structures to implement the code were left until the fall.

The students had lost and the battle looked fruitless except to a few dedicated students. Executive assistant Art Moses, a veteran of the Bissell years spearheaded a reexamination of SAC policy on discipline.

In a scathing memorandum written in August, he tore into the code and the weakness of the SAC position demanding the code be rejected and student opinion mobilized to overturn it.

There (are) a number of sections of the non-academic Code of Behavior over which substantive disagreement now exists."

—minutes, Governing Council executive committee meeting Jan. 15, 1974

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Daines Press Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Rally at 4, reject the Code at 4:30

Once again the discipline code is in front of Governing Council. Governing Council has before it a recommendation from its executive committee, which if approved, would fly in the face of students opposed to the code and could insure passage of the code, a document which even the executive committee admits has brought "substantial disagreement."

The crux of the problem in the executive recommendation is who has the power to decide what happens next.

As the wording now stands, the administration and council will determine whether there is "consensus" on the code and whether there has been "substantial progress" in resolving the disputed document.

If the administration feels there has been consensus of some sort and substantial progress then Governing Council will begin to implement the code in March.

Students must oppose this recommendation because they lose any chance to stop the code they have properly spoken against.

Instead, at this afternoon's meeting, there must be a loud student voice which university governors cannot ignore.

There can be no implementation of the code without the CONSENT of students. Students, not administrators, must decide the code issue and whether Simcoe Hall has made any "substantial progress."

In a series of long editorials this month we have argued against the current code with one basic thought behind it: It is strictly a question of who is being protected.

The academic section of the code mainly protects the university as an institution against students as a class. The question here which must be answered is:

Are the students of U of T sufficiently satisfied with the kind of education they are receiving to want that kind of system preserved wholly intact against any kind of change?

We think not. We feel the academic world is one place in society where change, debate and steady questioning of the status quo is mandatory for the health of the people and the institution.

To have this Conway-Cadario code contradicts one of the main purposes of a university: free expression.

What is needed as we have said at length, is an academic protection document for students, to guard them against the arbitrary and sometimes capricious whims of faculty and administration members.

A bill of rights, if you will, which recognizes students as citizens with rights, not children needing a tongue lashing by a big brother or sister is warranted.

By demanding the consent of students before any kind of code is passed, students are stepping forward where they may tackle the issue of the right to an equal voice in the matters which most affect them at the university: academics.

Such a demand also provides a second worthwhile objective inasmuch as the Conway-Cadario code contains a completely redundant section dealing with physical discipline.

As the two stories on Page 3 of today's issue show, there is simply no need for a physical code at U of T when the criminal code already is present—and that criminal code is a far harsher document than any sanctions conjured up in Simcoe Hall.

Well, my children, don't you feel we've reached 'consensus' on the basis of 'substantial progress'?"

Whereas in 1969 talk surrounded larger issues such as students and professors reaching operational agreement in the classroom, the administration has retreated to a position of wanting to get something through and damn the liberal surrogates and niceties.

Various officials in the administration have tried a number of tactics to do this, but perhaps one of the commonest has been negotiation and consultation—not out of any particular respect for students as citizens but from the realization of power relationships.

Students have the power to torpedo the code if they wish and the administration wants to defuse students to get the administration's way, hence the offer of negotiations. Because of this, negotiations have taken on a bad flavor for some.

If the administration offers to negotiate over the next two months, the student response must be loud and clear: "No code without student consent. Let the Governing Council make 'substantial progress' in recognizing students as citizens."

Perhaps it would be worthwhile if some of the bailing members of the council stopped to recall a little basic schoolwork they ought to have learned.

Democracy includes the notion that rulers must have the consent of the governed. If U of T's Governors miss that point today, maybe the first thing the code should do is strip them of their honorary degrees.

Comparing codes: the long arm of the law

Parts of the university's code of behaviour bears a striking resemblance to the Criminal Code of Canada, particularly the non-academic offences listed in the behavior code.

Students as well as any other person in Canada are subject to the provisions of the criminal code. Should the Conway-Cadario code be implemented at U of T, students would also be subject, in some cases, to virtually the same rules under the discipline code.

This would result in a peculiar situation, called double jurisdiction by lawyers, in which a student offender would be subject on the one hand to the discipline code provisions while at the same time be subject to the provisions of the criminal code.

In an effort to illustrate this overlap of coverage between the two codes, excerpts from both the criminal and behavior codes are printed below for comparison.

For space reasons only excerpts from the non-academic or physical discipline section are reprinted from the behavior code.

None of this is to imply this is the final word about whether the criminal code makes the discipline code irrelevant, but the similarities are so close, we thought you'd like to see for yourself.

With only one exception, the maximum penalty under the discipline code's non-academic section is expulsion. Maximum penalties under the criminal code are as noted.

OFFENCES UNDER THE DISCIPLINE CODE'S NON-ACADEMIC SECTION

1. In order to protect the administrative processes of the university it shall be an offence for any member:

A. To furnish knowingly and false information to the university (see Fraud, False Pretences and Personation);

B. With intent to become a member of the university or to gain a financial benefit or credit in a course or program of study, to furnish knowingly any false information to the university (see Fraud, False Pretences and Personation);

C. Fraudulently, or with intent to harm the university, any member, former member or any other employee of the university, to forge, alter, use, destroy or remove a university record or document of any kind (see Wilful Destruction, Mischief, Theft, Forgery, Possession of Stolen Goods, Assault);

D. To use the name of the university without lawful authority or permission (see Fraud, False Pretences, Forgery).

2. In order to protect the property and physical facilities of the university and the property of its members, it shall be an offence for any member:

A. To steal, damage intentionally or recklessly interfere with the operation or any property of the university (see Theft, Mischief);

B. To steal or damage intentionally or recklessly any library materials, laboratory supplies, equipment or instructional media of the university (see Theft, Mischief);

C. To be persistently in breach of the rules and regulations governing the use of any university library (see Mischief);

D. To obtain fraudulently any benefit of any kind from the use of university property or facilities (see Fraud, False Pretences);

E. To abuse intentionally or recklessly any privilege to use the computer facilities or instructional media of the university (see Mischief);

F. To steal or damage intentionally or recklessly the property of any person when such property is in the possession of the university or any member or on any premises of the university (see Mischief, Theft);

G. To harm any member in his academic pursuits, by stealing or damaging intentionally or recklessly the property of any person when such property is in the possession of the university or any member or on any premises of the university (see Mischief, Theft);

3. In order to protect the rights and freedoms of all members of the university community, it shall be an offence for any member:

A. To abuse physically or defame any person on any premises of the university or at any function or activity held by or under the auspices of the university (civil law suit or see Assault);

B. To disrupt intentionally, disturb or obstruct unduly any authorized activity on any premises of the university or any function or activity held by or under the auspices of the university (see Mischief);

C. To endanger intentionally or recklessly the health or safety of any person on any premises of the university or continue intentionally or recklessly to do anything which is likely to endanger the health or safety of any such person. (see Mischief);

D. For or with intent to gain a reward or benefit, to furnish or supply to or permit to be used by or made available to any person, any academic writing essay, theses, research report, project, assignment, notes or results, of academic work or research, whether written, made or obtained by the accused or by any other person, knowing or having reasonable grounds to believe that the same are likely to be used by any person for the purpose of obtaining fraudulently any academic standing or credit in a course or program of study in the university or at any other academic institution by any person if a member of the university or any other academic institution, or by any member of the university or any other academic institution (see Theft, False Pretences, Forgery, Personation).

(Editor's note: Three sections of the discipline code deal with students disobeying "any lawful order" from a member of the faculty on up to Governing Council. (While the criminal code does not deal with obeying "lawful orders" such as these civil law has a procedure whereby a person can get a court order forcing a second individual to obey an obligation to do something as required under law.)

(Likewise, while the criminal code does contain clauses against defamation—libel and slander—these clauses are almost never used. Instead libel and slander are almost always taken care of in civil suits.)

CERTAIN OFFENCES UNDER THE CRIMINAL CODE OF CANADA

1. PERSONATION

Every one who falsely, with intent to gain advantage for himself or some other person, personates a candidate at a competitive or qualifying examination held under the authority of law or in connection with a university, college or school or who knowingly avails himself of the results of such personation is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

(A summary conviction offence may bring a maximum penalty of $1,000 or six months in jail.)

2. FRAUD means, whether or not it is a false pretence within the meaning of this Act (the criminal code), defrauds the public or any person, whether ascertained or not, of any property, money or valuable security, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for 10 years.

3. FORGERY

A. (1) Everyone commits forgery who makes a false document, knowing it to be false, with intent

a. that it should in any way be used or acted upon as genuine to the prejudice of any one b. that some person should be induced, by the belief that it is genuine to do or to refrain from doing anything

(2) Making a false document includes

a. altering a genuine document in any material part, b. making a material addition to a genuine document or adding to it a false date, attestation, seal or other thing that is material, or c. making a material alteration in a genuine document by erasure, obliteration, removal or in any other ways.

(3) Forgery is complete as soon as a document is made with the knowledge and intent referred to in subsection (1) notwithstanding that the person who makes it does not intend that any particular person should use or act upon it as genuine

B. Every one who commits forgery is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for 14 years

C. Every one who, knowing that a document is forged, person anything whether animate or inanimate, with intent

a. to deprive temporarily or absolutely, the owner of it or a person who has a special property of interest in it, of the thing or of his property or interest in it, b. to pledge it or deposit it as security, c. to part with it under a condition with respect to its return that the person who parts with it may be unable to perform, or

d. to deal with it in such a manner that it cannot be restored in the condition in which it was at the time it was taken or converted.

2. A person commits theft when, with intent to steal anything, he moves it or causes it to move or to be moved, or begins to cause it to become movable.

3. A taking or conversion of anything may be fraudulent notwithstanding that it is effected without secrecy or attempt at concealment

(Editor's note: Maximum penalty for theft is 10 years in jail for an indictable offence involving theft of goods worth more than $200.

(If goods stolen were worth less than $200, maximum penalty is two years in jail for an indictable offence.)

5. POSSESSION OF STOLEN GOODS

Every one commits an offence who has anything in his possession knowing that it was obtained by the commission in Canada of an offence punishable by indictment (Editor's note: same maximum penalties as for theft).

B. (1) Every one who commits a common assault is guilty of a. an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years, or

b. an offence punishable on summary conviction.

(2) Every one who unlawfully causes bodily harm to any person or commits an assault that causes bodily harm to any person is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years

C. Every one who assaults a person with intent to commit an indictable offence is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for five years.

(Editor's note: The criminal

If the university wanted, the Criminal Code could cover sit-ins. However, calling in police could prove to be embarrassing. Therefore the Code of Behaviour is desired.

a. uses, deals with, or acts upon it, or

b. causes or attempts to cause any person to use, deal with, or act upon it, as if the document were genuine, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for 14 years

4. FALSE PRETENCES

A. A false pretence is a representation of a matter of fact either present or past, made by words or otherwise, that is known by the person who makes it to be false and that it is made with a fraudulent intent to induce the person to whom it is made to act upon it

B. Everyone commits an offence who by a false pretence, whether directly or through the medium of a contract obtained by a false pretence obtains anything in a respect of which the offence of theft may be committed or causes it to be delivered to another person

THEFT

1. Everyone commits theft who fraudulently and without color of right takes, or fraudulently and without color of right converts to his use or to the use of another

6. MISCHIEF

A. Every one commits mischief who wilfully

a. destroys or damages property b. renders property dangerous, useless, inoperative or ineffective, c. obstructs, interrupts or interferes with the lawful use, enjoyment or operation of property, or

d. obstructs, interrupts or interferes with any person in the lawful use, enjoyment or operation of property

B. Every one who commits mischief in relation to public property is guilty of a. an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for 14 years, or

b. an offence punishable on summary conviction.

C. Every one who commits mischief in relation to private property is guilty of a. an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for five years, or

b. an offence punishable on summary conviction.

D. Every one who wilfully does an act or wilfully omits to do code also contains a few clauses which the folks in Simcoe Hall forgot to put in the code:

8. COIN OPERATED DEVICES

Every one who without lawful excuse the proof of which lies upon him, has in his possession any instrument for breaking into a coin-operated device is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

9. COUNSELLING

Except where otherwise expressly provided by law, the following provisions apply in respect of persons who counsel, procure or incite other persons to commit offences namely,

a. Everyone who counsels, procures or incites another person to commit an indictable offence, if the offence is not committed, guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to the same punishment to which a person who attempts to commit that offence is liable; and

b. Every one who counsels, procures or incites another person to commit an offence punishable on summary conviction, if the offence is not committed, guilty of an offence on summary conviction.

SPONSERED BY SAC, GSU, AND THE COMMITTEE TO REJECT THE CODE

GAA uncommitted until union formed

Unaffected workers uninformed about Code

Some organizations representing U of T workers are not reacting at all to the Discipline Code mainly because the code doesn't involve some of them.

Tom Bribrisco, president of Local 1230 Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) said he could not claim to speak on behalf of his union.

"We have had no meeting to date to discuss the issue," he said. "We are having a general meeting next Monday. Depending on what happens this week, it might come up for discussion."

Judy Darcy, chief steward of the same local as Bribrisco said lack of information was a major stumbling block.

"I wish we were more informed and that the union could take a stand. We don't know much about the issue," she said.

Darcy also emphasized she was stating her own personal views and could not speak on behalf of her union.

Likewise, Michael O'Keefe, the president of the Graduate Assistants Association (GAA) declined to take a stand on the issue of discipline.

However, the GAA's inaction, as O'Keefe explained, has different causes and motives from that of CUPE.

"We have been shying away from making a stand before cer-tification (of our union)", he explained.

O'Keefe admitted this was a "conservative course" and added the consequences of taking a stand "would be hard to estimate. It wouldn't gain anything for us."

O'Keefe is personally opposed to the code and has signed the SAC-GSU petition opposing the code.

The University of Toronto

Staff Association (UTSA) is yet another organization unwilling to take a stand.

UTSA president Dave Priddle said yesterday: "I'd be loath to make any comment at the moment."

The discipline code as it stands at present would not apply to non-academic staff.

"The same kind of sanctions can't be applied to non-academic staff as well as students and faculty," he said.

Code: Negotiations until March

By BOB BETTSON

The Governing Council rejected a student amendment last night and passed an executive committee motion delaying implementation of the discipline code until March during which time negotiations are to take place.

The student amendment, defeated with only the student governors and alumnus Graham Cotter in favor, demanded consensus be reached before any disciplinary proposals are approved by council.

A motion by student governor Gord Barnes to repeal the code was ruled out of order by council chairman Malim Harding.

The two-hour debate revealed the depth of disagreement over how to deal with the question of discipline and the student demands to repeal the code were not supported by anyone else.

However the corporate and business figures on the council led by Sidney Hermant and W.J.D. Lewis led an attack on the student motion saying consensus was only desirable not necessary. Any other position, they said, would be allowing students a veto.

The polarization came as no surprise, but the lack of any support for the students' attempt at compromise upset the angry throng of students who packed the meeting.

The meeting was continually punctuated by student chants of "repeal the code" and continual jeering of speakers who defended the code.

The motion finally adopted by the council postponed the implementation of the code until March, saying it is "injurious" to implement while there is significant opposition.

The motion sets up a special negotiating committee made up of representatives of SAC, GSU, APUS and UTFA as well as Conway, Paikin, and Dove to discuss amendments to the code before the March meeting.

A succession of faculty and other members stressed the need for some attempts at negotiation and added it was necessary to immediately implement the academic section.

However vice-president Jill Conway told the meeting there was an impasse over non-academic sections of the code.

She admitted differences could not be resolved on the controversial non-academic sections of the code.

President John Evans said it was clear the academic sections of the code should be implemented in March while also conceding non-academic sections would have to wait.

Conway said she was concerned the academic sections be implemented in order to replace the all-faculty Caput, which she said everyone recognized as inadequate.

Cotter supported the student motion saying he agreed with the SAC position on discipline calling for parity on all existing decision-making bodies as well as operational agreement in the classroom and negotiation on substantive issues during occupations.

He asked the council why students were not represented on a parity basis on all bodies, adding the alumni certainly would agree with more substantial student representation on decision-making bodies.

Burnes called the possibilities of a solution, unlikely.

He was "cynical" after the series

Governing Council head table sits behind oddly-spelled placard at yesterday's noisy meeting of fruitless negotiations already held between students and various administrators.

Academic affairs chairman John Dove said there was no substantial disagreement on the academic sections of the code.

He said amendments should be received and considered but the code carefully delineated the rights of students.

"I would support the general principle of understanding or consensus," charged the code was a response to student demonstrations challenging the monopoly of power held by faculty and administrators.

Student governor Howard Levitt

"The only way students have been able to force change is through mass action. The code is an attempt to legitimize suppression by making disruptions quasi-legal offences."

Even Claude Bissell (former U of T president) accepted the principle of substantive negotiations, he added.

Sonja Sinclair, government appointee, warned council not to forget the university not only belongs to Governing Council, staff and students.

She said "the ethnic community opposes the small, vocal, militant, minority who are asserting their views."

Scarborough principal Ralph 'Campbell, author of the Campbell report on discipline shelved in the formulation of the new code, said the academic sections should be implemented but the other parts of the code must be implemented with consensus

Workers interrupt Council, angry about prof's theories

By BOB BETTSON

Governing Council member Gary Thaler calls for an inquiry into alleged racist theories of U of T prof Ian Hector.

A group of angry representatives from the Italian community interrupted yesterday's meeting of Governing Council after council refused to hear their complaints about medical professor Ian Hector.

Led by the editor of an Italian community newspaper and supported by students in attendance, the Italians finally presented their case even though chairman Malim Harding had ruled them out of order.

John Grohovsky, editor of Il Giornale di Toronto, made an impassioned speech after taking the microphones, denouncing Hector's "racist" theories and demanding an investigation of the embattled medical professor.

Later after the workers and students had left Erindale professor Gary Thaler announced notice of motion for council's next meeting calling for the inquiry into Hector's alleged teaching of racist theories.

Vol. 94, No. 46

Fri., Jan. 25, 1974

THE Varsity TORONTO

A petition was presented by the speakers with over 300 signatures from the Italian community and 700 from the campus demanding the inquiry.

This was only after council refused a motion by Gord Barnes to change the agenda to hear the workers on the grounds they are disabled and had travelled a long way to speak to the council.

After numerous interruptions as the council attempted to continue with other business, the students and workers finally prevailed defying Harding's attempts to silence them.

Grohovsky said he was concerned about the doctors of tomorrow being taught racist theories about diagnosing members of minority groups.

He added if Hector was proved guilty of teaching racist theories, he should be fired.

"We already have too many Ian Hectors in this world and if we can do away with just one of them we have done a great service to society and mankind."

Later president John Evans said an investigation was out of the question until specific charges were made about Hector's teaching.

He said an investigation by the medical faculty into the charges had proved them false and added the university had no control over the private views of individual faculty members.

However Thaler demanded his motion stand and it is to be discussed at the next meeting of the council.

University down on scholarship program

By RANDY ROBERTSON

U of T has decided not to engage in any open-ended entrance scholarship program in the coming academic year.

Such programs—which give free tuition to all Ontario Scholars who apply—are currently in effect at a number of other Ontario universities.

A motion to U of T's academic affairs committee last Tuesday by its subcommittee on admissions and awards recommended U of T maintain "its entrance scholarship program at essentially its present level."

The motion's approval precluded the adaptation of the open-ended scholarship program.

University president John Evans said changes should be made in present scholarship programs only in relation to academic programs and not to create "a mechanism of leverage to lure students away from the other universities."

U of T should not get into "the scholarship game," and should not engage in "this financial warfare," Evans said.

A report prepared for the subcommittee, by the director of the office of student awards, Patrick Phillips, notes U of T attracts more Ontario scholars than any other Ontario university anyway.

U of T has 26.6 per cent of those scholars followed by Queen's—25.4 per cent — and Waterloo—22.8 per cent.

As Evans said, "the U of T does have advantages that other universities do not have in attracting good quality students."

U of T ranks twelfth in the province, though, in the number of scholarships it gives to grade 13 students admitted with over 80 per cent.

U of T, that is, gives a scholarship to only one in four grade 13 students with over 80 per cent average.

Yet U of T, with the exception of the University of Western Ontario ($13 awards—$310,500), has the largest entrance scholarship program in Ontario—$263,900 for a total of 459 awards.

The report also notes: "The entrance scholarship programs at New, Innis, Scarborough and Erindale are notoriously weak."

The allocations to those four colleges have not been increased for many years.

And unlike the older colleges which have been able to accumulate reasonably substantial entrance scholarship endowments these colleges are totally dependant on allocations—from the Varsity Fund and from the university.

The report notes the calibre of the students registering at these colleges is increasingly better, that Scarborough and Erindale are the growth areas of the university, and the students at these last two colleges are particularly vulnerable to enlarged entrance scholarship programs at other universities, "particularly York University."

The report suggests if any unexpected sums do come to the university they might be directed to the suburban colleges for scholarship purposes.

Athletic food contract questioned, passed

By CHRIS ROBINSON

Tuesday's Athletic Directorate meeting failed for the first time to gloss over the food concessions granted to Canterbury Grenadier Ltd. for Varsity Arena and Stadium.

For the past 21 years the contract has been renewed without any serious consideration of the actual financial details.

Canterbury maintains the concession stands and staff, paying the UTAA a 25 per cent cut on gross sales, except for tobacco and confectioneries where it is claimed profit margins are too low.

For Toronto Toros hockey games, the receipts go directly into the trust fund for the new athletic building.

Last year the UTAA realized a total profit of $14,169.42. Since the extra overhead costs are negligible, this figure is pure profit.

Questions by students elicited the interesting fact there have never been competitive tenders, nor has any attempt been made to compare costs with other potential suppliers. Assistant director (administrative)

Dave Tinker said the UTAA had always had a "good working relationship" with Canterbury and had seen no reason to look elsewhere.

He admitted he had no idea what other companies might be available as competitors.

He also said some tentative proposals had been received from other concerns, but these had never materialized.

The actual contract requested this time is for three years ending December 31, 1976.

It would then be renewed automatically every year after unless either party gave notice in writing by October 31 of the previous year.

If the circumstances of the situation changed drastically, either party could terminate the contract at any time by giving three months written notice.

One committee member, claiming some experience in the field, said Canterbury Grenadier had a "very good" reputation in the business, and was supposed to be very reliable.

After the directorate digested this information the motion to renew the contract was passed without dissent.

It now requires the approval of the U of T risk manager for insurance considerations, and the solicitors for legal problems.

An interview with Tinker also revealed during the meeting he had said the UTAA could audit the Canterbury accounts if it wanted to, but Tinker failed to say if this had ever been done.

A small pack of cigarettes retails at arena and stadium concessions for 75 cents, while it goes for 60 to 65 cents in other stores and vending machines.

A carton sells for $5.09 at a local drug store chain, which means Canterbury would be making a 47.3 per cent mark-up even if it paid retail prices for its cigarettes.

At wholesale prices this figure would be well over 50 per cent

There is no indication what sort of mark-up Canterbury charges on its other items, if this level is too low to pay U of T a percentage.

Tinker also pointed out Canterbury Grenadier Ltd. is owned by General Foods (Canada) Ltd. which is in turn a wholly-owned subsidiary of the American giant, General Foods (GF), the same people who make Gaines Burgers, Post cereals, Jello and many other goodies.

Canterbury issues no public financial statements because they are wholly consolidated into General Foods (Canada).

Last year GF had sales in Canada of $213 million and after-tax profits of a more than $10 million.

Canterbury is the same outfit that city alderman Dan Heap took aim at last fall for selling California grapes and lettuce in the city hall cafeteria which it caters.

If you have never patronized the city hall cafeteria or one of the concessions at the arena and stadium, there is no need for despair.

Canterbury Grenadier also serves at the CNE all year, Sunnyside Pool, Riverdale Zoo, Forest Hill Arena (the same arena the Toros ship U of T's extra recreational skaters to), York Stadium, Edwards Gardens, and the Canterbury Inn in Sarnia.

They're listed in the yellow pages under caterers, along with 10 pages of other such enterprises, none of whom seem to be interested in the Varsity concessions.

Rape centre opening soon

By MARILYN EMERSON

During a panel discussion on rape yesterday at Trinity Church, members of the Toronto Rape Crisis Centre announced they expect to begin operations during the week of February 4.

The telephone number of the crisis centre is to be widely publicized through radio, television, the press and posters, while the exact location of the centre is to be kept secret.

The centre, assisted by and working in co-operation with the Toronto General Hospital, will offer the victim of rape every possible kind of help from qualified volunteers.

It was in response to a 76-per-cent increase in the number of reported rapes in Metro Toronto over the past five years that a nucleus of 45 concerned women have been working to establish the centre which was refused a Local Initiatives Project grant.

Speaking on the panel were moderator Isabel De Bourdais and guest speakers from the Rape Crisis Centre, Lynda Jewison and Joan Miles.

Jewison and Miles concurred many more rape crimes are committed than are reported.

Women are reluctant to report rape crimes because normally it is not the crime but the "victim's virtue that is put on trial," Jewison said.

Miles sees the main feature of the centre as its exclusively female staff — a significant change from the usual male personnel handling rape crimes.

"All our workers will be female. They will offer reassurance for the victims. This is a policy and we intend to adhere to it."

Suggesting how to combat the problem De Bourdais said the prime objective must be "counselling to enable the girl to get over the trauma in order to lead a normal sex life in the future."

Academic debates Evans' working paper

By RANDY ROBERTSON

University president John Evans' proposals for integrating the federated colleges were again before the academic affairs committee of the governing council.

At Tuesday's meeting, Evans defended his controversial proposals.

Evans said he felt there was a "deep commitment" to the objectives and a "willingness" despite many differences of opinion "on the part of those who drew up a progress report to co-operate to realize the educational objectives."

The report evolved from Evans' discussions with the heads of all colleges, the deans of Arts and Science and Graduate Studies, and Jack Sword, vice president of institutional relations and planning.

Academic affairs student representative David Laughton claimed the report reflects the concerns of these people, "the concerns of the colleges and the academic staff to maintain their identity and independence."

Laughton suggested the proposals may not really "mix" the university but rather will preserve the "cosy corners" which some faculty members may have established for themselves.

Laughton claimed the progress report really does not deal with making the colleges more responsive and meaningful to undergraduates.

The report suggests a collegiate board be set up, composed of the heads of all the colleges, the deans of arts and science and of graduate studies, and the vice-president, institutional relations and planning.

Laughton demanded the board include student representatives from all the college student councils and from SAC.

Fellow student representative Gord Barnes urged student involvement in the discussions so that educational goals will be given priority instead of the fiscal goals involved in the mechanisms.

The collegiate board is to co-ordinate the proposal objectives in relation to the colleges and "to monitor the mechanisms to make sure they really implement those objectives."

Trinity provost George Ignatieff, reacting to Evans' introduction of the report said the university has to think of the colleges "in dynamic rather than in static terms."

"After a transitional period the colleges will develop into an organic system."

"Vital to this concept of the colleges is the collegiate board."

Evans supported Ignatieff's interpretation of the role envisaged for the college and affirmed himself the importance of the collegiate board.

"We can't hope to see all of our problems solved for all time... We can only make sure that our objectives are right."

Committee member B.P. Storchett wondered, since the tendency towards more and more courses will be accelerated by the new proposals, whether the individual student will ever come to grips with the real subject.

Arts and Science Dean Bob Greene concurred in Storchett's fears.

"There is unanimity within the Faculty of Arts and Science the number of available courses has now passed the point where it is of any service of its students."

"Departments proposing new courses are being given a hard time. There is a real concern not only in the Faculty of Arts and Science but in all divisions of the university about this problem."

Greene disputed Ignatieff's proposal that the relationship between the university and the colleges had been static prior to the college proposals.

Greene saw the proposals as "part of a continuing process" a process instanced in the movement of the mathematics and philosophy departments completely out of University College, the move of the Department of Near Eastern studies from one college to another, the development of a Department of Islamic studies, the development of a program in Jewish studies, the creation of Innis College and New College, the recent creation of College X, and the present proposal that those environmental programs currently sheltered by Zoology and INX be transferred to Innis.

New College president Don Ivey said he had supported the original report very strongly and he still supported this report "but less strongly."

"The further down the line go the more things will have to be spelled out, the more detail will be necessary, the greater necessity for compromise there will be."

"There are a number of things in this report I do not understand because they are subject to a variety of interpretations."

Ivey suggested the proposals be adapted as quickly as possible before the initial impetus wears out. He urged Evans to push for action if he wanted to get anything done.

An observer asked the meeting whether the multi-faculty colleges which Innis and New were originally intended to be were going to be maintained as multi-faculty colleges or whether the proposals were meant mainly for the arts colleges.

Greene replied the rigidity of separation between the multi-faculty colleges and those which have not been multi-faculty is being dissolved. "All colleges," Evans said, "are moving towards more students from more faculties."

The committee noted the colleges are controlled by humanities people.

Evans suggested the individual colleges might involve those people who have not become part of the college system "in a meaningful relationship" by developing professional subjects such as the physical and life sciences.

Evans noting as well that the science subjects suffer sheer physical constraints — such as those involved in laboratory work — said tutorials might be centralized or moved to other areas.

But he also noted, "this — and much else — needs a great deal of further study."

Erindale Dean E.A. Robinson claimed the university is "not inexperienced in the matter of collegiate boards."

Collegiate boards are involved in the administration of Erindale and Scarborough and their relationships with the downtown departments, he said.

The relationships between the colleges and the departments were beneficial to the colleges involved and to university, Robinson stated.

SAC should talk with students, not admin

Reform of the university suffered another set-back yesterday when the Governing Council passed an executive committee resolution setting up further negotiating structures to discuss the code of behavior.

Internal affairs chairwoman Marnie Paikin pulled out a not-so-surprising amendment which SAC president Anderson and the other negotiators probably figured was coming, if (?) they didn't know about it beforehand.

Unfortunately Anderson seemed resigned to the whole process and proceeded to toe the latest SAC line of no implementation of the code without the CONSENT of the students it affects.

The "consent" approval never came.

Holding up the Governing Council as sacrosanct and legitimate (which it isn't under the present structure) council members such as Crown Trust's W.J.D. Lewis claimed a "shall-not-be-implemented-without-the-consent-of-students" amendment added to the executive committee's resolution would give students effective veto over the Governing Council.

However, as we all realize by now this can never be permitted, even on a piece of legislation asking students to discipline themselves.

The executive committee resolution understood "it would be injudicious to implement a code of behavior containing sections grievously objected to by those it would regulate."

However, the resolution then went on to set the timetable for decision and negotiation on the "sections grievously objected to".

As it now stands the code will come before the internal affairs committee Monday for review, and the structures and procedures (the machinery to operate the code) will be reviewed sometime in February by both the internal affairs and academic affairs committees.

The executive committee resolution passed by the Governing Council allows the administration, not students or faculty, to establish when "consensus" (But not CONSENT) has been reached on the Code.

If "substantial progress towards consensus" on the code has been achieved by March meeting of the Governing Council, the Council "will take no legislative action prior to January 1, 1975, on the non-academic sections of the Code on which consensus has not been reached."

After that time council would take a fresh look at such matters."

The Paikin amendment provides for recognition of a review committee composed of two students from each of the GSU, APUS, SAC, and two from the faculty association, and the chairpersons from internal affairs and academic affairs along with selected representatives from both committees.

So, in effect, nothing has changed.

The so-called "legitimate student organizations" are once again contemplating negotiating, even after the obvious failures of this process over the past few weeks.

Instead of putting most of their efforts into talking with students about what the code will mean to them, the student organizations have chosen to negotiate with the administration.

The student councils appear to have forgotten who elected them.

What right do they have to negotiate when close to 2,000 students have already decided to reject the code?

We reject the code because it seeks to perpetuate an already repressive status quo—both academically and non-academically.

The academic sections of the code should not be accepted until the university administration has seen fit to include students on decision-making bodies that affect their education.

The non-academic sections of the code are unnecessary as we tried to point out yesterday.

We already have the criminal code. We don't need another code and "double jurisdiction."

Not only does the criminal code punish students, but the non-academic code of behavior adds insult to injury by its "expulsion" from the university powers. The non-academic code is not necessary except as a deterrent to peaceful protest.

The Forster task force on academic appointments (staff-ling) fits in quite neatly to the timetable, and it would be a positive act for any further strategy by the politicians to include the issue of student representation of these decision-making bodies.

As SAC might recall it has a "mandate" to establish equal staff/student representation on these committees.

This area could be one section of an academic code that would provide students with some "rights" or "academic protection" from both faculty and a money-saving administration. (Watch for even more cutbacks in the next few years.)

If the administration wants any code at all it must be prepared to grant students parity on these decision-making bodies as a prerequisite for allowing the university to impose academic penalties on students in the university's own self-interest.

Your elected representatives should be moving in this direction to protect your rights as students.

The Conway-Cadario code must be repealed. The student councils' will have to do a better job of explaining the real issues and principles at hand to their true allies—students—instead of spending countless hours negotiating in Simcoe Hall.

Such negotiations also permit an acceptance of such tactics and detract from any discussion and feedback campaign.

The student councils have, in fact, demonstrated some principles over the past few months in handling the code.

Unfortunately the principles have turned out to be little more than 'liberal' principles—good when they suit the moment, but tossed aside in the face of compromise.

And these people ask us to support them?

SAC education commissioner David Galbraith (774) and Michael Kaufman (to the right of the sign) apparently want the Conway-Cadario Code repealed.

Medusa Megaphone helped with the rally yesterday without the aid of mirrors.

SMC asks $4.25 million for Forest Hill land

By DAVID SIMMONDS

Anyone want to buy a piece of property from St. Michael's College for $4.25 million?

That's the price St. Mike's is asking for 10 acres of land it owns in the Forest Hill area, on the edge of the Cedarvale ravine.

The Spadina subway system is due to be constructed through the ravine in 1976, and a station in the area will create development pressure on the St. Mike's property.

Moreover, the value of the property will rise with construction of the subway.

The financially-troubled college once owned 6.86 acres of land within the ravine itself.

This was sold to the city of Toronto in 1969, after seven years of negotiations.

The advance payment by the city was $2.5 million, and total payment is believed to be about $3.5 million.

St. Mike's still owns 10.31 acres, 1.55 of which are in the borough of York, and 8.76 in the Forest Hill district of the City of Toronto.

Of the 8.76 acres in the city of Toronto, 3.43 acres encompass a ravine, and the southern 5.33 acres are tableland, or level land fill.

The problems for St. Mike's first began when the city designated all the St. Mike's land lying within the city as "ravine," which would have protected the property from development.

Under the city of Toronto Act of 1971, a ravine designation prohibits "the destruction of such trees or other natural vegetation and the excavating or other altering of contours of any such land without the consent of the corporation."

The proposal brought strenuous objections from lawyers for St. Mike's, who pointed out not all of the land within the city owned by the college could properly be called ravine.

The city agreed with this objection, and in May designated only the northern 5.33 acres as ravine. The remaining 5.33 acres of tableland are not classified as ravine.

However, although the northern portion is protected from development, the property is still owned by St. Mike's.

St. Mike's is prepared to sell all its land to the city for a price of $4.25 million, based on its value for real estate development.

The tableland belonging to St. Mike's, and lying within the city, is worth considerably less at present.

According to Yvonne Yamoaka, of the city's neighborhood planning division, the area is presently zoned for single family detached houses, and a sports practice field.

This designation may change, however. The old village of Forest Hill was incorporated into the city in 1967, and the city has not fully incorporated its own zoning bylaws with the Forest Hill bylaws, which are still presently in force.

The southern 1.55 acres of the St. Mike's land which lie in the borough of York are zoned for one and two-family single houses, semi-detached houses and duplexes.

The city is presently conducting a review of all ravine land under its jurisdiction.

A group of proposals for ravine designation, including the St. Mike's ravine, has been approved by the city planning board and the city buildings and development committee.

It has still to be approved by city parks committee and city council, but a date has not been set for those votes.

A city planning board report of September 1973 recommended local residents, local aldermen and architects for St. Mike's get together to discuss use of the tableland.

ASSU plans its evaluations

By ANNE HEALY

This year's plan for course evaluation was presented at the Tuesday ASSU (Arts and Science Student Union) meeting. The results of the evaluation are to be available to students for pre-registration in April.

The system uses standardized answer forms and "allows great flexibility with minimum administrative difficulty or delay" according to Dave DePoe, ASSU field-worker.

Each course union sets up its own set of questions—up to 58—which require graded responses. The questionnaires, with answer sheets, are then distributed to the course sections to be completed by the students.

The responses are to be returned to the ASSU by February 16 so that during reading week they can be keypunched and fed through a computer.

The results, to be published on tabloid-size newspaper, will also include compiled comments about the courses and professors.

The plan was approved at this year's first general council meeting of the union. It marks a departure from past policy, which put the onus on publishing a booklet with the course union.

Booklets have generally not come out until the fall, after students have already made their choices. The new approach is intended to work as more of a counter calendar.

The council also approved course union budgets of $3,000 to finance the activities of nine arts and science course unions for the next year.

Funds were also approved for a full time field-worker during the academic year ($4,600), course evaluation ($6,000), and other projects ($2,000) leaving a surplus of under $1,000.

The union is financed from the two dollar educational rebate given to faculty student groups by SAC.

Executive member Rick Gregory said the union hopes to submit a brief to the committee considering ways to select students for tenure committees as well as starting a student caucus to negotiate with President John Evans on plans to centralize the college system.

The union, in its second year is made up of course union representatives, faculty council representatives, and college representatives.

Taxers say split the rent

By ELEANOR SIMPSON

For those of you recently blessed with your 1973 income tax return or those still waiting with bated breath, here is a handy hint straight, as they say, from the horse's mouth (better known as the District Taxation Office).

If you share a rented apartment, house, or hovel with a friend, it is to your advantage to split the rental payment for Ontario tax credit.

In fact, you could save as much as $50 or more on your income tax (even a refund) by using a loophole even the tax people approve.

Unfortunately this does not apply if the people sharing are married (to each other) or otherwise related.

To see what this may mean to you, follow us through the following example.

Let us assume you and your friend pay $100 a month rent or $50 each. If one of you claims the full amount, this is how it works out:

Total rental payment is $1200. 20 percent of $1200 is $240 which for tax purposes is your occupancy cost. Since the property tax credit must be the lesser of $90 or the occupancy cost, your credit is, therefore, $90. To this is added 10 percent of the occupancy cost or $24, giving a total property tax credit of $114 for two people.

If each of you claims half the rent ($600), 20 percent amounts to $120. Since this is over $90 you have to claim $90 to which you add 10 percent of the occupancy cost ($12) making a total of $102 for each person.

The point of this whole thing is—if one person claims the entire rent for credit the tax he pays is reduced by $114, but if each claims half the tax each pays is reduced by $102.

In case you wonder about the legality, splitting the rent was suggested by the District Taxation Office and can be done even if the lease, if any, is in only one name.

Salaff isn't clear on appeal possibilities

Dismissed mathematics professor Stephen Salaff is sincere in wanting to appeal his firing to university president John Evans, but so far it is far from clear just what kind of appeal Evans is offering.

Evans has already written the former part-time professor indicating Evans would personally review the dismissal behind closed doors with a law professor. But Salaff has refrained from taking the offer up until he knows whether he could get reinstated.

A year ago students occupied the offices of the mathematics department after Salaff was notified of his firing and two other popular mathematics professors were denied tenure. Salaff's students have repeatedly praised his teaching ability.

In his most recent letter to Evans, Salaff says: "In both your (Evans') letter of November 12 and December 14, you refer to 'normal procedures'."

"As you know, I was a part-time faculty member and as far as I am aware there are no established grievance procedures for part-time faculty."

Salaff was responding to letters from Evans in which Evans indicated the closed door hearing, but Evans did not indicate what might come out of the meeting.

Previously, Salaff has said he wants his case to be a focal point for the issue of what rights of appeal part-time teaching staff have when dismissed.

Currently part-time instructors are hired and fired at the discretion of the department they work for.

On the other hand, full-time professors denied tenure may appeal that denial to the university president, although the appeal is handled behind closed doors.

Salaff asked Evans in the letter: "Your letter of November 12 draws analogies between the procedures involved in appealing denials of tenure and the procedure which might be employed in my case."

"Are these tenure-appeal procedures the 'normal procedures' you refer to?"

Salaff says he wants Evans to clarify what is to go on during the hearing first before any hearing takes place.

Students graded differently

By MARGARET ROBERTSON

The academic affairs subcommittee on curriculum and standards did not have time to continue its discussion of grading practices at Wednesday's meeting.

However, during the presentation of a brief on calendar changes, members learned students in the faculty of education are graded somewhat differently to those in other faculties.

Professor D.L. Mumford of the Faculty of Education said while students are given an alphabetical rating at the years end, unlike other departments there is no numerical significance attached.

Failing students are permitted to take examinations as a "last chance," but otherwise examinations are not written. Papers which may be required during the year are read, but not graded, by the instructor.

Mumford told the sub-committee most courses are of the "workshop" type, designed to develop teaching abilities.

"Assessment," he said, "is subjective...purely a personal judgement of an individual student's development by an individual instructor."

He emphasized students have a great deal of say in determining the rating system and liked this method.

In other business before the subcommittee, a motion was approved to recommend a program for a masters degree in industrial relations to the academic affairs committee.

Some members were concerned the graduates from this program would be working against the unions, but Dean J.H.G. Crispo pointed out that they would be available for all who wished to hire them.

He added, however, that unions usually preferred to "stick with their own type" rather than the "university-educated" but that this did not decrease the need for specialists in this field.

Those fabulous kinky Kinks have spun out a new record

Preservation Act One Kinks
RCA, $8.29

Ray Davies, source of most song material for the Kinks, has a way of embarking on projects which never get completed.

In 1970, the Kinks released Lola Versus Powerman and the Moneygoround, Vol. 1, an attack on the record business. (I've been invited to a dinner with a prominent queen) Their record company at the time, Reprise, was not enthused with the project, and so Vol. II, though recorded, never appeared. Not long after the Kinks folded their tents and moved to RCA.

The reason why you are unlikely to see Preservation Act Two is somewhat different.

After the lukewarm reception of the group's second RCA album, Everybody's in Showbiz, Ray Davies, who has always been the centre around which the other Kinks revolve, decided a shift in direction was needed.

In 1968, the Kinks released The Village Green Preservation Society. Davies had never really been satisfied with the arrangements of the songs on that album, and had long harbored the urge to record them again. He knew, however, that no one would buy a re-recording of old Kinks songs except die-hard Kinks fans, who are not as numerous as could be wished.

Consequently, he wrote some new songs, on the Village Green theme. The plan was to present both the old and the new songs in a special concert at London's Rainbow Club. Although the sound at the concert was not good enough to record, the new songs eventually made up Preservation Act One, the group having headed back to the studio.

If the old Village Green songs are ever re-recorded, a more than slightly hypothetical proposition — they will make up Act Two.

The decision to return to the Village Green concept was a good one, as it sees the Kinks doing what they do best.

Over the past seven or eight years, ever since the first faltering attempt of "Well-Respected Man," Ray Davies has been consciously putting together a composite picture of English post-war society.

The Lola and Showbiz albums, however, represent an extended detour in which Davies expresses his personal frustrations as an artist. My feeling was that the impulse behind such tunes as "Motorway" was too personal, even bitchy; the Village Green album is made explicit in the lyrics.

"Change in the Weather" on Preservation features a classically Davies horn arrangement — flautist tuba and all.

For the last few albums, Davies has been trying to integrate horns into the Kinks sound, with indifferent success. But this album indicates that he has finally made the transition.

Over the course of Preservation, several inhabitants of the Village Green world step forward to sing a song or two. For the most part, their characters are differentiated by Ray Davies' considerable range in vocal styles. The Preservation songs may well be tied together in a loose story framework, as was the case on the Kinks' earlier Arthur.

The Kinks' gradual trend toward concept albums, noticeable as far back as the original Village Green album, makes me wonder if, in a well-ordered universe, Ray Davies would be a rock musician at all. I can see him writing scores for musicals — not musicals as they exist on Broadway currently perhaps, but as they once were, in the hey-day of Cole Porter.

The Kinks' connection with rock is often tenuous. This is not to deny that their strong rhythm-and-blues beat, a holdover from the old days of "You Really Got Me," "Milk Cow Blues," or "Till the End of the Day," is their single most distinctive trademark. Nevertheless, the impression which emerges from a careful listening of their last ten (Count 'em. Ten!) albums, from Face to Face on, is that Ray Davies is capable of drawing on anything that has been done in popular music for the last 75 years. The Kinks have, at various times, recorded a bossa nova (One of them, or anybody's), most beautiful songs, "No Return," on Something Else, a children's song ("Phenomenal Cat," from Village Green), insipid love songs (e.g. "The Love Used to Be," from the soundtrack of Percy), and roughly half of their production since 1965-6 has at least some affinity with English musical tradition, including much of the music on Preservation.

P.S. Over the summer, a great crisis threatened the state of Western culture. Rolling Stone reported that Ray Davies had left the Kinks. The immediate cause was his wife, who, without warning, had packed up and 'went back to her Ma and Pa', which Davies blamed on the band's constant touring.

Your correspondent hot-footed it to Round Records to discuss this development with Ted Tretter, an expert on the subject.

Ted scoffed at the rumours. "Ah, don't read Rolling Stone," he said. "They're six months behind. Melody Maker reports he's been seen with them. The Kinks are still together."

Sure enough, on the cover of Preservation Davies is sitting, fondling a cornet, cigar between his teeth. He appears happy.

'I can close my eyes.'

Miller's all-American salesman stars at actor-run theatre

In 1949 Arthur Miller's Death of a Salesman premiered, astounding audiences with its sharp and moving insight into American life. The play was honoured with five awards including the Drama Critics award and the Pulitzer prize. All praise was certainly justified. Miller without a doubt created a masterpiece of the modern stage, valid today as it was at the time of its conception.

However tackling a production of this play in 1974 is certainly a more difficult prospect than it was 25 years ago. Most people who have ever studied English in high school have studied Death of a Salesman and probably just as many have been exposed to the production frequently shown on TV with Lee J. Cobb as salesman Willy Loman. Therefore the company is at a slight disadvantage. There is a relative amount of anticipation and preconceived notions as to how certain characters should be portrayed.

The Performing Theatre Company, after a successful run of John Osborne's Look Back in Anger, are now presenting Miller's important play. The PTC was created by Geoffrey Saville Read and his wife Krysla with a rather unusual concept at its base. The company is actor controlled, "the energy and quality of each production springing from creative urges of the actors rather than from decisions made by artistic directors." It follows then that each actor in the production has a desire to tackle the specific role. Happily this energy and dedication flows through the show making it a memorable experience.

George Touliatos, known to Toronto audiences for his participation in The House of Blue Leaves at the St. Lawrence Centre this past summer, plays Willy. It's a part that requires a great delving into the psychology of this immensely complex character. He is both a man of poetry and a salesman eager to make it to the top. Touliatos makes this transition with skill.

There was nevertheless an impediment to Touliatos' performance. This unfortunately was Peter McConnell's portrayal of Willy's son Biff. Willy's life revolves around Biff and so do many of the scenes. Miller's Biff as his brother Happy.

observes is "a poet, and idealist"; however this Biff is little more than a smart aleck. The discovery of "the woman" in Willy's hotel room, can be one of the most moving in the play, but McConnell's superficial handling of the part renders it merely embarrassing.

The role of Happy, Willy's "other son" is brought out of obscurity through Art Hindle's deft performance. Hindle often brings the audience to laughter, adding a much needed sense of relief.

The part of Linda, Willy's wife is a delicate one. She could easily become simpering as many Lindas in the past have been. Irene Hogan's Linda is certainly not weak; she is more often than not heroic. During the Requiem, one could scarcely look anywhere but at the silent suffering face of Linda. It was truly captivating.

George Murray, a fairly well-known Canadian face presents a Charlie who is both a cynical comedian and the man who is Willy's "only friend". Murray is definitely a highlight of the show. Another character deserving mention is Gordon McGivern who plays the double role of Howard and Stanley the waiter. His contribution is small but it adds to the overall polish of the production.

Miller's play is a constant merging of past and present and the changes in this show are brought off with exceptional smoothness. Sound effects, lighting and set are important to achieve the mind-like illusion. Michael McArthur, Todd Jeffery Ellis, and Roger Read are to be congratulated respectively. Every five or 10 minutes one could hear and feel the rumble of a subway. Sound effects? No, the Palmerston Library sits directly over the subway line. At first it was annoying but soon it had the strange effect of being part of the production; noises from a neighbourhood "where you have to break your neck to see a star".

Despite appropriate subway sounds, the Palmerston Library is an unfortunate choice of theatre. There is not a great deal of incline and one is constantly straining to see the action on stage. However the power which emanates from the cast is enough to conquer these environmental difficulties.

Murray McLaughlin

I remember first hearing Murray McLaughlin in 1966. It was at the Riverboat, where I'd gone to see Joni Mitchell. That was even before she was a big star. It was running late into the evening and Joni introduced a singer-friend of hers, Murray. He was a skinny, curly headed youth wearing faded denims and steel-pointed boots. And he had a lot of harmonicas. He only sang one song, a composition of his own called "Murray's Mountain". He never did record it. It wasn't a great song but it stuck in my mind well enough to remember both it and him.

The next time I saw him was at the 1967 Mariposa Folk Festival at Innis Lake. It was Murray's debut. He sang a few original songs and got a standing ovation. He came back out and said he hadn't expected an encore, and didn't have any more songs prepared. So he left everyone with "Wabash Cannonball". It was a fine performance.

Since that time, I've followed Murray closely, and seen him, at least another 25 times. And make no mistake about it he's matured as a performer and a songwriter. His lyrics display insights into life, living in the city, relationships and the people of the streets.

McLaughlin's newest album is called Day To Day Dust (True North Columbia) and it's by far his best recording. It's closer in atmosphere to his first LP, Songs From The Street, than the last one. But this new album feels much more vibrant and relevant to the Murray McLaughlin I've seen over the years.

The tracks were recorded in Toronto at Eastern Sound over the summer. They represent the first production effort for Murray and Bernie Finkelstein (his manager). Both should be congratulated for the clear crisp sound and an outstanding mix. The arrangements on Day To Day Dust are simple but effective. The only musicians are bassist Dennis Penderith plus guitarist Amos Garrett and drummer Chris Parker from Paul Butterfield's Better Days. The combination Jorge Borges doesn't believe writers should gorge themselves on a smorgasborg of purple prose. Prune the unnecessary says this orthodox Argentine.

Crisp words on the art of economical writing

Borges on Writing
by Norman Thomas di Giovanni, Michael Halpern and Frank MacShane.
E.P. Dutton

is a very modest little book addressed to the converted Borges enthusiast and not to the uninitiated. (One of this is the fact that the master's full name, Jorge Luis Borges, does not appear in the entire volume.)

is more valuable for the brilliant insights it drops by-the-by than for any content argument or program. It, as it were, the reader in hearing distance to an unrefined literary sensibility in the process of exercising itself.

orges, of course, is the craftsman of excellent short stories written in that simple, direct-of-the-fact prose style which sounds, to the untrained ear, so easy to write, and in fact the most difficult. He is a perfectionist of Flaubert's science of "the word". His virtuosity resides not in what he uses but in what he can afford to throw away.

The book is based on the tape recorded transcripts of three seminars Borges delivered at Columbia University's graduate writing workshop, and is divided into three sections each dealing with one of Borges' talents: there is a section on prose, which takes one of Borges' stories apart line by line; a section on poetry, which does the same to a few of his (excellent) poems and finally, a section dealing with translation.

The structural format of the talks (i.e. that of Borges textually analyzing his works and of fielding germane questions) stands in the way of his natural gifts for digression and part of the fun of the book is watching Borges—spry and ironical—get around it. When he does digress unobstructed, Borges displays an both encyclopedic knowledge of literature and an impeccable critical faculty, which together, if nothing else, are inspiring.

Borges, like all serious modern critics, is anti-romantic. He believes, like Eliot, in the impersonal nature of the artistic process: of the absolute separation of the "man who suffers and the mind that creates." He believes that the serious writer must have a sense of literary history and a respect for the continuity of literary tradition. His respect for the integrity of language is absolute. Although a Argentine, his mother descended from British nobility and his English is impeccable. His spoken English reads like the prose of DeFoe and his written prose like that of Samuel Johnson. And yet when translating any of his works from the original Spanish into English, he collaborates with a native English speaking writer, giving him final authority. According to Borges the "exact work" of the Eighteenth Century is not the "exact word" of today.

Borges is against deliberate obfuscation in literature, impatient with most "purple prose" and with most of what a friend of mine has labelled "intestinal smear" poetry. He believes that the poetry easiest and most natural to write is ultimately the most difficult to understand. Long unheeded, he has advised young poets to stay away from free verse and work with the traditional poetic forms and conventions, which according to Borges give him something concrete to build upon besides his own emotions.

"My advice to young poets", says Borges, "is to begin with the classical forms of verse, and only after that become revolutionary. I remember an observation by Oscar Wilde — a prophetic observation. He said, were it not for the sonnet, the set forms of verse, we should all be at the mercy of genius. This is what's happening today; at least this is what's happening in my country. Almost every day I receive books of verse that put me at the mercy of genius — that is to say, books that seem to me quite meaningless."

"Sense, Horatio, sense!" Borges is a conservative on literature as on most matters. Don't expect any sparkling revelations from this book. Borges is deeply rooted in orthodoxy; but as the brilliant insights which he sprouts indicate, orthodoxy can be very nourishing.

Man: guts and punch works together well to give McLaughlin the full funky sound he needs, rounding out each song with economical accompaniment that underscores and never intrudes.

The opening cut, and the single, is "Hurricane of Change". It would be impossible to say that there's a "best song" on the album but it's certainly one of the better songs. I'm intrigued by the intros to a few of the things on the record and "Hurricane" is one. It starts off with a low keyed sound: piano first (played by Murray) then some guitar, and muffled drums, and it breaks loose when the vocals and cutting snare drums enter. As on every song on the LP, the lyrics aren't just an excuse for vocal exercise. Mama Mama I seen the world and I had to call/The spring of the world/Deseried for a bloody fall/For bloody gold — they kill the land/Leave no place for free born man/Bullets bite and the hate still spits/And the wind don't whisper it screams that's it/What's that sound that haunts me through the rain/Is it the breath of grief or the hurricane of change?

"Linda Won't You Take Me In" is a punchy little mandolin driven song. The lyrics are a touch on the raw side as Murray pounds out his fantasies to Linda (Lovelace perhaps) with lines like: Put my dinner in your oven/Cook my steak there in your fire, or You sing the sweetest music/When your mouth is open wide/Linda won't you take me in.

"Six For Five" and "Paradise" are both good funky straight ahead songs and there's a great John Lee Hooker feel to the intro on "Six For Five". The ballad is most ably filled by "You Need A New Lover Now" and "The Fool Who'd Watch You Go" is a honky tonk, Country-flavoured, tear jarker, that should be on every truck stop jukebox.

If there were fewer good songs on the album, I might have had time to mention Murray's gutsy blues harp playing and his concert at Massey Hall tomorrow.

Agony, torso chunks: gross art from a modern-day de Sade

Two jars of hot banana peppers on display at the Isaacs Gallery?

Artist Mark Prent claims to have elevated this sordid commercial product to art by having placed a card on the wall nearby reading "Vaginal Peppers".

Such is the power of suggestion.

Compared to the rest of the exhibit, however, this coup is remarkably subtle, something of a breathing space after the naked man in the ice-box ("Thawing Out") and before undergoing the rigours of "The Operating Room".

Prent's "Environments", as he calls them, are for the most part, life-size or larger constructions which are all technically superb, combining the faultless deliberation of a surgeon-general with the imagination of the Marquis de Sade.

Incorporating his painted fiberglass figures (or parts thereof) and real props, Prent has created a series of totally grotesque situations.

The first thing greeting the viewer upon entering the gallery is a huge spotless meat freezer with closed door and front window view.

Suspended from the ceiling of its gleaming white interior are dozens of arms, legs and torsos, all of them bloody and contorted and stamped "Choice Approved Quality."

The title of this offering is "Hanging is Very Important".

Moving right along past a rather peculiar looking "Banana Tree" one discovers what appears from the outside to be an immaculate outhouse.

Again the spectator is invited to peer inside through the scratches on a tiny painted window which have been made by carving FUCK YOU from within.

Inside an invalid man is portrayed in agony on the toilet.

Aside from the self-conscious black comedy of these displays they remain disturbing, as much in their cold, uncompassionate rendering as in the actual violence portrayed.

Within each of the "environments" the setting is chillingly antiseptic and clinically perfect as if some deadly machine were playing games with our human frailties.

The artist claims to, and apparently does view mutilation as a "problem in esthetics" rather than as social commentary—this tends to enhance this point.

Still a visit to the showing can be very interesting, particularly in reference to the intellectual and emotional responses which such drastic statements inevitably produce.

One can even have the cathartic experience of electrocuting a convincing looking dummy and watching it convulse for thirty seconds.

Although one might have thought that modern society was becoming impervious to shock, outrage at a Prent exhibition two years ago led even to legal battles and after a visit by Metro police the Isaacs Gallery is encountering similar problems right now.

Art of this nature can serve to expose the reality of ugliness and brutality to those who wish to deny it although in some of the enthusiastic faces I encountered I saw rather an excessive willingness to tear off the rose coloured glasses and view desecration as what life is really all about.

Another alternative, perhaps the sadder, is of people becoming so callous and immune to sights like this that they deaden their humane responses to human suffering.

Prent's flagrant contempt for any sort of human dignity certainly brings this thought to mind.

Simon tries for pathos

The name of Neil Simon, for me at least, conjures up a vision of a shadowy figure (with no distinguishing characteristics besides a distinct aura of "money") standing beside a dictaphone coolly creating sharp one-liners within the confines of a clever little plot, designed to MAKE the American public laugh.

His plays are enjoyable, ranging from mildly amusing to fairly humorous. He is certainly one of the most prolific American playwrights, though not the 20th century's Shakespeare as some have erroneously called him. Since 1960 he has churned out over 17 plays including such successes as Barfot In the Park, The Odd Couple, Plaza Suite and Promises, Promises.

The Menagerie Players have chosen for their most recent production one of Simon's so-called different plays, The Gingerbread Lady. It concerns the alcoholism of a worn-out singer Evy Meara. The action begins with Evy returning to her chintzy New York apartment after spending 10 weeks in a rest home for alcoholics. She is greeted by her homosexual actor friend Jimmy, and an obnoxious beauty parlour queen, (who ultimately finds herself), Toby Landau. They are apparently her only friends. The only other character is Evy's daughter Polly who feels a definite reforming urge toward her mother.

Nothing of great note occurs in the first act. Evy is revealed to be a comedian; a master of the one-liner and not content at all to be on the wagon. She eventually begins to drink again and her one-liners aren't funny any more, they are sad. Unfortunately Simon's script is very confusing for the audience. Evy cracks an amusing joke causing laughter. However before the audience has a chance to recover Simon has moved into the realm of the tragic; everyone is still laughing.

Joan Westlake who plays the drunken Evy, is good in sort of an undefinable way. She draws a great deal of laughter from the audience, though often at the wrong times. Her high point is that she is convincingly drunk. Being drunk on stage is a difficult endeavour. It requires a little more than falling over and slurring words. There must be a definite schizophrenia, which Ms. Westlake seems to handle well.

Ralph Norman as the homosexual Jimmy is embarrassingly skaky throughout. He lacks presence though the audience seems to enjoy his wriggling, fluffing of his hair and batting of his eyelashes. It is amazing the way audiences delight in homosexual humour.

Dianne Moore is an attractive Polly. She has a charming voice and is satisfying in the role.

Overall the production seems to lack polish but it is enjoyable and for those who like Neil Simon the show will be playing tonight and tomorrow at The Central Library Theatre.

Confused direction spoils Don't Look Now

There is much to admire in Nicholas Roeg's stylish puzzle Don't Look Now. Unfortunately there is not enough. The gap between the material and its treatment is as extreme as in any movie I've seen (except possibly Last Year At Marienbad, which was a chic vacuum). In this gothic tale, past, present and future are shuffled together, but nothing works because too many cards are missing. Thrillers are a lot like pornography — neither genre lends itself to ellipsis. Leave things out that people have every right to expect and they'll feel cheated. Don't Look Now cheats, and so fails, but on the way it works up some heady atmosphere.

The setting is Venice, languishing in sensuous rot. For some reason this eerie, enchanting city has never come to life in film as it has in literature. Even Death in Venice seemed pallid because Visconti, who manages to insinuate the dark and the decadent into everything he does, unaccountably used Venice to no more effect than a sound stage. Roeg, however, reveals in its exquisite creepiness, catching something of the sinister unctuousness of its inhabitants and roaming the labyrinthine canals by night.

Julie Christie and Donald Sutherland are an affluent, creative couple whose daughter drowned. Two spinster Englishwomen, who cackle like Macbeth's weird sisters at an office party, keep unavoidably crossing their paths. One of them, blind, claims to communicate with the dead girl. Christie is elated. Sutherland troubled; it seems he too is psychic but fears to admit it. The plot sprouts ever more grotesque ramifications; their son in England has an accident, and murdered corpses are dredged out of the waterways. Sutherland escapes death by the closest of shaves, and a sense of doom collects like thunderclouds.

Visually, the film is entrancing. One montage, which has little to do with anything else, is the most memorable passage in the story. Sutherland and Christie, after bathing before dinner, begin to make love. Intercut with the two nude bodies writhing on the bed are shots of them afterwards, withdrawn, slithering into clothes, striding down to dinner. It is an elegant exercise in the art of the cinema, more successful than the film as a whole, which despite all its portentousness becomes merely pretentious. Don't Look Now is a tale of the supernatural without enough substance to keep a ghost alive.

Seeing El Topo is something like coming across the corpse of a unicorn lying in the road. Totally unexpected, it is incomprehensibly beautiful, and in one's amazement that such creatures do after all exist one tends to overlook the essential fact that it is dead. Perhaps the fate of Jodorowsky's film even casts some light on the cause of the unicorn's death: confronted with a world in which everything must be explained and justified, the mythical beast choked to death on its own metaphysic. The film has been referred to as a surrealist western. Certainly it is fraught with images as crystalline and subliminally powerful and disturbing as any surrealist work, but they are consistently undermined by explanations. Meanings lurk under every stone. It's like de Chirico with footnotes. Take the first sequence for example. A lone rider dressed all in black, with a black beard, on a black horse, holding a black umbrella, over his head rides slowly across unbroken sun-white sand towards the camera. As he approaches, it becomes apparent that there is something behind him on the saddle. It is a small naked boy. The horseman stops, dismounts, and lifts the boy down onto the sand. He hands the boy a teddy bear and gilt framed portrait and says something in Spanish. The boy squats and buries the bear and the portrait in the sand. The man then lifts the boy back onto the horse and they ride away into the whiteness. A powerful image. Unfortunately, there are sub-titles. "You are seven years old. You are a man. But your first toy and the picture of your mother." One half-expects the boy to look up and say, "Oh, yeah. I think I see what you're getting at."

The power of El Topo is not only diluted by over-explicitness but by an utter deluge of message. It is as if Jodorowsky tried to say everything he had to say all at once. One wonders what's left for the sequel, Hijo del Topo, which he is reputedly in the process of shooting. The film is about God, death, love, revolution, peace, truth, and man's inhumanity to man. Its five chapters are modestly entitled Genesis, Exodus, Psalms, Prophets, and Apocalypse. With so much to say and so many facets, the film spends much of its Director Jodorowsky undermines powerful images by using too much message-packed dialogue.

El Topo: The spaghetti western discovers metaphysics time undermining its own impact. At the conclusion of a sequence illustrating the virtues of patience and compassion taken from a zen story, the hero-guru suddenly wheels, races into the next scene and mows down sinners with a Winchester rifle. All in all, Jodorowsky's transcendentalism is bathed in a prodigious amount of panchromatic blood. It is not enough for a man to absorb eighteen bullets in this film, he must then pour kerosene over himself and light himself on fire in order to finally die. But this is no ordinary man; this is El Topo, the Mole, who, when asked by a bandit chief whom he is about to castrate, "Who are you to judge me like this?," replies without batting an eyelash, "I'm God." Flick.

Jodorowsky has a surprising reluctance to trust his own images to bring his points home. This is uncanny since it is those images, which he drew out of the Mexican desert, which make the film the near-masterpiece it is. He succumbs repeatedly to the temptation to impose alien elements upon his work. He is at his weakest when he is hemmed in by the unfamiliar predetermined pace and narrative of a Buddhist anecdote, the essence of which he never does manage to convey. And it is incomprehensible why he felt he needed to transplant geodesic structures and oriental style wise men into the central-American desert, when the desert itself provided a far more effective and un-hackneyed metaphor. Jodorowsky has taken the Sergio Leone spaghetti-western format, complete with its cheap color and has created an almost unendurably vivid universe, peopled with demigods and deformities. The seeming effortlessness with which he creates endless images powerful enough by themselves to rivet an audience's attention to the screen for the entire length of the film is awesome. And it is a long film. The images achieved a uniqueness and clarity which makes them difficult to forget: a man without legs roped to a man without arms to form one huge staggering gunman. An enormous cavern, every crevice of which is piled with barrels out of each of which peers an emaciated and deformed face. An ancient and naked man confronting the invincible gunfighter with a butterfly-net.

In spite of all its flaws, El Topo, which is being shown Saturday midnight at Cinecity, should not be missed. If you can manage to sit where you can't read the subtitles, which should not be difficult at Cinecity, you are in for a powerful experience

When are Hegel and Marx like Sanford and Son?

Fashions and fads are a way of life in our society, as evidenced by the proliferation of trendy spin-offs in the television industry. Once a programme has made an obvious impact, you can guarantee that the next season will feature more variations on a theme than the 10 plagues (which in many cases might have been preferable to what we get). Not only that, but even the original culprit may itself be a facsimile of something else ("All in the Family" is a classic example). In most cases the subject is flogged to death not just by overexposure, but also by overexposure to poor and shoddy material. The pattern seems to be inevitable.

After a proper period of mourning (or rejoicing), it is useful to go back to look at the originals again, not for a feeling of nostalgia, but to disentangle the key ideas and problems posed which might well have been lost in the shuffle. This pattern seems to be true as well in the publishing industry, perhaps nowhere as well as in the books on Hegel and Marx — often pointedly referred to as the Hegel-Marx industry.

In a very simplified form, the analyses might be said to have gone in three main directions: Marxism as existentialism; Marxism as a scientific dialectic; and Marxism as a transcended Hegelianism that perhaps shouldn't have been transcended quite so much. In any and all cases, analysts must come to grips with Marx's relationship to Hegel.

Three recently published works reveal some of the best aspect of the spin-off: Jean Hyppolite's reprinted Studies on Marx and Hegel; Lucio Colletti, and Dick Howard's The Development of the Marxian Dialectic. In many ways, they reveal not only sectional concerns, but also generational ones.

Hyppolite's book was first published in 1955. He and Alexandre Kojève were perhaps most responsible for introducing Hegelian thought into French consciousness. His main contribution was a re-awakening of interest in Hegel's writings, in order that they might not be overlooked, as valuable in their own right, not simply as a precursor and foil to Marx. French existentialism, as exemplified by the early Sartre, is unthinkable without Hyppolite and Kojève. As such, it is a useful introduction.

Colletti turns 50 this year. An Italian philosopher, his writings are just now being "discovered" in the current controversy with the "scientific" French-Italian school characterised by Louis Althusser and Galvan Della Volpe. Colletti himself has been heavily influenced by Della Volpe, but treats him more as a guide than as a standard. Colletti argues that Hegel was essentially a Christian philosopher and an anti-materialist, and asserts the importance of empirical science against the claims of "infinite reason".

Marx's later works, especially Capital, form the basis of his mature thought. What Marx owes to Hegel is a true theory of reason, the famous "rational kernel" of Hegel's dialectic. Hegel was able to develop coherently the idea that thought is not an object, separate from reality. For Colletti, Hegel takes the "rational totality as the true concrete", and thus goes astray. He shared the religious, Christian thesis that the finite does not exist by itself, but is something created, secondary, and dependent. In other words, he is undone by his idealism. It is later interpreters who have forced their own conceptions into their analysis of Hegel.

Dick Howard is a young American Marxist scholar whose primary concern is the relation of theory to practice. He distinguishes the concept of "mediation" as the central core of Marxism. Without mediation, theory remains idealistic and powerless to effect social change. Marx replaced Hegel's contemplative dialectic with a dialectic between philosophy and the world which demanded that philosophy become worldly and the world philosophical. Accord-ding to Howard, the solution to the theory-praxis problem is the mediation of the proletariat. In the book he concentrates on the early works but denies a schism between the two periods. Indeed, he suggests that the actual process involved was the development of the dialectical theory of proletarian revolution followed by a fuller explication in the later writings. It is a most provocative and stimulating book.

Hopefully, future works on the subject will also attempt new insights into the topic, and not be satisfied with the "Son of Sanford and Son" syndrome.

A family of Metis photographed in 1910.

No preaching in this tale of Metis life

Seldom does one read an autobiography that is not a self glorification ritual. As one Canadian historian recently told his class, the best way to make sure people interpret history your way is to write your own autobiography.

Halfbreed is an exception. It doesn't preach; probably that's why it succeeds.

"I am not bitter I have passed that stage. I only want to say: this is what it was like. This is what it still like," says author Maria Campbell.

And that simply is what she does. There is not rhetoric about the white man's burden. She just tells the story of her life, how she has lived and suffered under poverty, crime and subtle and not so subtle discrimination.

The Metis are almost a forgotten people in Canada. It is not even a well known part of our history that the only armed rebellion since Confederation was Riel's Metis rebellion of 1885. Riel was hanged by the Canadian government as a traitor but he has lived on as an inspiration for his people.

Unlike many members of minority groups who have written books partially on the topic of racial discrimination, Campbell writes from the perspective of one who has had her eyes opened by the experience but possesses no undying hatred for the white race. She shows, in fact, how her people have been unable to assert themselves, giving them a share of the blame for their plight.

She is not, like Howard Adams, a Metis militant calling for revolution. She sees this as an unlikely possibility and one that would only result in another group being oppressed.

As a realist she believes native movements have their limitations and at the conclusions of the book offers this thought as her only hope for the future.

"I believe that one day very soon, people will set aside their differences and come together as one. Maybe not because we love one another, but because we need one another to survive. Then, together, we will fight our common enemies."

She engages in an unusual amount of self-criticism, revealing how she rejected her own society to marry a white man and how she comes to realize that despite the life of poverty on the Metis settlements, the native person in white society is even worse off.

The most enjoyable part of Halfbreed is that Campbell tells simply and movingly of her childhood. She doesn't paint a black picture.

In fact, unlike Heather Robertson's Reservations Are For Indians, which has been criticized by native people for emphasizing only the wretched poverty of Indians, Halfbreed avoids this pitfall. She elaborated on the positive side of Metis existence telling stories of their self-reliance, wisdom, determination and intelligence.

She shows how Metis society is in many ways superior, with its high degree of tolerance, strong sense of community, and astute perceptions about the right way to live.

Halfbreed follows Campbell as she leaves her secure family existence in Saskatchewan to find the good life in the big city. Yet in Vancouver she quickly sees that living within the lower portions of white society is anything but desirable.

Her life and decline in Vancouver slums, with its white criminals and dope addicts, is an all too realistic picture of the prospects for the poor Metis or native person in the big city. She becomes a prostitute to support her heroin habit and after a nervous breakdown, ends up in a mental hospital.

All through this account we are more impressed by her compassion and understanding than her hatred. She correctly perceives that the people who exploit her are as fucked up as she is. Finally she struggles to regain her sanity in spite of the huge barriers she faces. But she ends up as an alcoholic, feeding the white stereotype of Metis and native society. Eventually, helped by Alcoholics Anonymous she breaks the habit.

The constant theme throughout the book is the influence of white society on the periphery of Metis settlements, a society reaping the benefits but not helping find solutions.

The white institutions are the factors which most influence the Metis — the churches, the schools, the courts, the businesses, the police and the government. Without hatred, Campbell demonstrates how these groups put a blanket on Metis society, benefiting from their poverty.

The CCF in Saskatchewan under Tommy Douglas does not fare too well under Campbell's scrutiny. She hates the welfare system. It doesn't solve problems, it perpetuates them, she says. The social democratic paradise, though certainly more just, is not a paradise for the Metis population.

Welfare, when viewed objectively does not ameliorate poverty, it sustains it. When the Metis gets his welfare cheque it is spent buying high-priced groceries and spirits from white businessmen. Thus the whites benefit from welfare. But do the metis?

Campbell's experience makes her cynical. She longs for change, but sees it neither in native movements nor white politics. Even social democrats can't seem to perceive the Metis' real need for self-help and self-reliance. Their charity is blind. The church in Metis society has always seen itself as the benevolent benefactor of the exploited people. But somehow things haven't changed. Even Government bureaucrats and church officials must admit that.

The unfortunate thing about the book is that it doesn't offer detailed alternatives for the future. But maybe this is too difficult a task for one book. Solutions at this point in time seem to be very hard to come by, even for native and metis spokesman. The book lacks overall political perspective but this is a forgivable omission. It may be a virtue because for the uninitiated reader the author makes many political points without explicitly stating them — a very difficult task, indeed.

She realizes how society has co-opted native and Metis dissent with its willingness to provide jobs for many of the militants who so bitterly criticized them. She points how she was hired by the Alberta government in a social service role to co-opt her desire for change.

This book is a lesson for anyone who strives for radical change; repressive tolerance is an easy technique for the establishment to soften dissent and mask the oppression and racism that characterizes capitalist society.

Sunday Evening Concerts; more than a moment's ornament
Therefore let the moon
Shine on thee in thy solitary walk;
And let the misty mountain winds be free
To blow against thee: and, in after years,
When these wild ecstasies shall be matured
Into a sober pleasure; when thy mind
Shall be a mansion for all lovely forms,
Thy memory be as a dwelling-place
For all sweet sounds and harmonies; oh! then,
If solitude, or fear, or pain, or grief,
Should be thy portion, with what healing thoughts
Of tender joy wilt thou remember me,
And these my exhortations! Nor, perchance -
If I should be where I no more can hear
Thy voice, nor catch from thy wild eyes these gleams
Of past existence - wilt thou then forget
That on the boughs of this delightful birch
We sat together.

Watsup

theatre

There's so much happening this week and next that this will be a to-the-point listing of Watsup. The Colonnade Theatre opened Arsenic and Old Lace this week, a comic-mystery classic noted for being one of the longest running plays in theatre history. It plays Thursday and Friday at 8:30 and Saturdays at 7 and 9:30. In performance at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, 390 Dupont Street, is Alfred Musset's No Trifling With Love, which deals with revolutionary ideas on equality for women (for its time that is). Four new plays open January 31. The Academy of Theatre Arts, at 23 Grenville Street, presents Mac Frisch's play The Fire Raisers, an incredible study of acquiescence to crime and shared guilt applicable to pre-Nazi Germany, pre-Hiroshima, pre-Vietnam and even pre-Watergate. It all takes place in one man's home though. Toronto Workshop Productions opens Ten Lost Years, based on Barry Broadfoot's "best-seller" novel about the depression years in Canada. Théâtre du P'tit Bonheur, in spite of drastic grant cut-backs, are continuing with Faut Qu'Tu Fasses Ta Vie and Joulez-Moi D'Amour. They are to be found at 95 Danforth Avenue. Student tickets are $2.00. And finally also opening on that popular January 31st date, The Firehall Theatre will present Total Eclipse, a play by Christopher Hampton about French poets Rimbaud and Verlaine and their attempts to extend the limits of experience in one of history's most notorious love affairs.

Finally on campus, there's still time to catch Hart House Theatre's dynamic new interpretation of Peer Gunt. It plays tonight and tomorrow night at 8:30.

town on Monday to do two shows at Ryerson, at 7 and 10 p.m. Tickets are only $2.50.

Jonli Mitchell will be performing at Massey Hall on February 10, backed by Tom Scott and the LA Express. There hasn't been any advertising but the concert is almost sold out. If you can't get tickets for that one, you might try for tickets for her February 9 performance at Sir Wilfred Laurier University in Kitchener ($5.50). Word is that she'll be doing new material from her soon to be released album, Court and Spark on which she's gone electric. Her backup band includes reedman Tom Scott, bassist Max Bennett, drummer John Guerin and Roger Calloway.

Fiddlers' Green Coffeehouse, (call 489-3001) features a Calldh (pronounced kay-lee) or musical gathering of friends this evening. Paul Lauzon and Susan Marquart, both from Montreal will be entertaining on Tuesday. Admission is $1.

String Band, who've just released an excellent album called "Canadian Sunset" are playing out at the Erindale pub tonight.

The new Dylan/Band album was released in the US on Tuesday and should be available here next week. Retitled Planet Waves it features all new material, some acoustic as well as rock. There are two interpretations of the song "Forever Young", that was performed at the Gardens both nights. One is a lengthy acoustic version and the other is a shorter (2 minutes) rock treatment.

movies

I don't have the tolerance for camp that most of my friends do, at least not when I go to a movie. (On TV though, I can absently pass time with the worst late show, providing it's not a made-for-television one or a '60s spy movie with a one word title.) For example, I thought The Gang's All Here risible until it got repetitious — but friends not only thought it was a riot, they thought it was good. Maybe it's me. In any case I don't usually get up to the Revue, the theatre that specializes in American musicals, epics and revivals. (They also show Japanese, European and Silent films.) This week's musical is Dames (1934) with Joan Blondell, Dick Powell and Ruby Keeler, to be shown on Thursday. The epic (Sunday) is Lawrence of Arabia which I ran into again a couple of years ago and was thoroughly embarrassed by. Bad art is timeless.

On the other hand, my three favourite movies are all in town this week. Jan Troell's The New Land continues at the International, although it should be seen after Troell's first half, The Emigrants. The films were made to be shown together or back to back, but Warner's decided to test the North American market with the first and hold the second for a year. They also did a bit of clumsy shortening, but the movies are so magnificent they survive it all with flying colours. Tonight and tomorrow night you can catch The Emigrants at St. Mike's, although the projection facilities are not the best for Troell's beautiful photography, and the seats may get uncomfortable as the movie nears the two and a half hour mark. If you are undaunted, you had best check whether there is one or two shows a night.

My other favourite is Cries and Whispers, although favourite is an odd word for this extraordinarily heavy but rewarding film. It is beautifully conceived, written and shot, and it stars Ingrid Thulin, Liv Ullmann, Kari Sylwan and Bebe Rebozo. Many acknowledge it as Bergman's best. Monday at the Roxy with Cassevetes' Faces.

Tuesday and Wednesday, the Roxy shows Lindsay Anderson's It... All three of Anderson's movies (This Sporting Life, It... and O Lucky Man!) are very good and distinctly Anderson's. Also on the bill is Bertolucci's The Conformist which seems to be based on the premise that fascism results from repressed homosexuality. I don't know what some folks see in Bertolucci.

And, starting Saturday at the Revue, is Jacques Tati's Playtime which will run through Thursday. Tati's dry visual humour goes by some people, while others revere him. I lean to the latter, largely on the basis of Les Vacances de Ms. Hulot. I haven't seen Playtime but I intend to.

No sight of Wee Georgie.

classical

This Sunday eve at 8:30 the New Chamber Orchestra of Canada gives its second concert of the new year, and as all the previous ones have been up-to-the-wall sellouts, you're advised to get tickets early. By the way, the NCOOC is in desperate financial straits as its LIP grant has gone the way of all government grants—down the toilet. Ker-lush!! They would greatly appreciate any contributions, either in money or help of any sort to keep them afloat. It would be more than a shame to see this fine new orchestra have to bite the dust, as they're possibly the finest small ensemble presently active in this city, perhaps even the whole country. Do try to attend the concert, though, as the lineup looks good: Shostakovich's Concerto No. 1 and a host of other goodies, rarely heard in Toronto are on the bill. That's at 8:30 in Hart House.

Speaking of hard times, The National Ballet is in deep trouble, although there have been no official announcements to that effect yet. They have stopped giving out complimentary tickets for reviewers except for the Toronto Daily Honderich, The Map and Pail, and the Toronto Sexist) and advertising has been limited drastically. The reason? Money, as you might expect. Nureyev probably doesn't come cheap, and the re-staging of that mammoth production of Sleeping Beauty is bound to set them back a few rubles, too. Tickets will probably be scarce again this week, with sellouts predicted by a week before curtain time. Nureyev performs in almost every ballet, making it his show this year. More news to come.

Ah, the CBC. Plagued with a gutless censor in the TV department (Tom Benson) they seek to make up for their deficiencies by sending out tons of program material. Complete FM, AM and TV listings arrive on my desk every week and the poor thing is in danger of collapsing now. To ease the load a bit... Sunday at 7:03 on CBL-FM Offenbach's Tales of Hoffman will be heard. Whether they're Judge Julius or Abbie's isn't indicated. Lit buffs can hear the old master himself at 8 on Thursday as Vladimir Nabokov is interviewed. Back again on Sunday at 8:05 AM (I) Verdi's Requiem is on tap. Or just turn them on anytime to hear announcers who talk with that instantly identifiable CBC accent.

art

There's a good bias shattering water color show at the Hart House Gallery. Although one of the water-colourists, John Anderson, by far overshadows the other three, all four artists work with the kind of authority I've been brought up not to expect from water colourists. The works of both William Frampton and Oswald Timmas, are textually interesting although in very different ways. The former, working in monochromes, creates austere, earthy textures, the latter creates rich, biot textures. Jim Tilley, is the weakest of the group. His works are "thin" and eclectic. Concentrate on Anderson if you want to learn something. His Hoffmannish paintings survey spatial compositional and architectural qualities indicative of... well, not genius, to be sure... of a muscular brush stroke. Hear, hear!

Know your plectrums better

In these days when the increase of concert guitarists is rivaled only by the soaring blood pressures on Wall Street, media references to "classical" guitar and "classical" guitarists have multiplied dramatically. The term "classical" is however incorrect and should be replaced by the term "classic". Nitpicking pedantry, you say. It might indeed seem that, but the distinction between the terms is an important one.

The term "classical", in its application to music, implies to most people, the vaguely-defined corpus of music played by the TSO and the FM stations. To those who frequent the halls of the Edward Johnson building, it implies also an historical period, that of the Viennese classics. The "classic" guitar, rather, derives its name from its characteristic form, and the appellation "classic" serves to distinguish it from its many variants, the flamenco, plectrum, and electric guitars. It is only incidental that much of the classic guitar repertoire falls within the bounds of what most people would consider "classical" music.

Scholars believe that the direct prototype of the "classic" guitar originated in Spain in the early 16th century. This instrument had seven gut strings, arranged in three pairs or "courses", and a single top string. Near the end of the 16th century a fifth course was added and in the late 18th century, yet another. The great problems of tuning the six-course guitar, probably only paralleled by those facing the modern-day lutenist, subsequently motivated the simplification to six single strings, which still remains the standard arrangement of the classic guitar.

There are many specifications which define the classic guitar but they are all, to some extent, flexible, more or less like the basic members of an architectural order. Of course, each luthier carried distinguishing attitudes toward acoustic quality into his craftsmanship.

The Flamenco guitar, the most closely related of all the variants to its "classic" parent, has been adapted to the specialized needs of Spanish folk music. Light construction and stringing give it its characteristic metallic timbre and other modifications contribute to the production of percussive effects.

The plectrum guitar developed in the USA during the 1920's to satisfy the need of jazz players for an instrument of sufficient volume to mark the strong rhythmic beat of the music. Most of the structural modifications of the plectrum guitar result from the use of steel strings with their high tensions in place of the nylon strings of the classic guitar. The physical difficulty of playing steel strings with sufficient force by the classic guitar fingertip or fingernail right-hand technique prompted the adoption of the plectrum.

The electric guitar also developed from a desire for increased volume, and developed for use in the field of jazz. Most modern electric guitars have thin, solid wood bodies that are no more than frames upon which strings are stretched and electronic controls mounted. Their only connections with the classic guitar are the number and tuning of their strings and the possession of a fretboard. In fact, most musicologists now believe that the membership of the electric guitar to the guitar family is highly questionable.

Those interested in enjoying performances of classical (oops, classic) guitar virtuosity should tune in to CBL-FM on Tuesdays at 6:30 p.m. John Williams will be featured in the upcoming show.

rock

If you missed last week's 99¢ Potluck, you still get another chance. Two more evenings of music and things will be held by the Open Circle Theater in an effort to raise money for new productions. The following musicians have already promised to appear tonight or tomorrow: Cedric Smith, String Band, Nancy White, Pierre Gallant, and Rex Begonia. In addition there will be puppets, silent flicks, poetry and playlets all for 99¢. The place is 103 Bellevue, off College, 2 blocks west of Spadina and the official time is 9 pm to midnight.

The increase in record prices that has been talked about so much is finally here. List prices have been quietly pushed up on certain LP's in the past month or so but there hadn't been an official, across the board, increase. But as of tomorrow, all A & M releases that carried list prices of $5.99 will list for $6.49. And all new releases will list at $6.99. On March 1, Polydor Records will boost their list prices from $6.29 to $7.29. WEA, which includes Warner Brothers, Atlantic, Asylum, Elektra, Atco and Reprise, has boosted all list prices to $7.29 from $6.29 effective immediately.

The increases will probably cost you an extra 50¢ to 70¢, in record stores. The days of the $4 disc are just about over. As they say, onward and UP ward.

For a Toronto artist, a solo concert at Massey Hall is the symbol of success. One of Toronto's best singer-songwriters, Murray McLaughlin has just made it. Murray's in concert tomorrow evening at 8:30. Tickets are priced at $3.50 to $5.50. If you plan to attend and haven't got tickets, I'd move quickly to do so. It's almost sold out.

The Miles Davis concert set for Sunday is completely sold out.

Blues barbecue sacrificial Rams 14-2

By PAUL CARSON

The unfortunate mis-match at Varsity Arena Wednesday night succeeded only in demonstrating most of the problems still confronting inter-collegiate hockey in Ontario, and probably in all of Canada.

The hockey Blues yawned their way to an uneven 14-2 victory over the hapless Ryerson Rams before approximately 300 die-hard fans who spent the evening sitting on their hands and yelling the odd obscenity.

Blues recorded their thirteenth consecutive OUAA victory (counting 'last week's four-point laughter against RMC as two wins) without appearing to expend any undue energy while Rams to their credit gave it their best—and still lost by 12 goals.

The true extent of Blues' domination is reflected in the shots on goal, where Varsity held an unbelievable 79-22 advantage, broken down by periods as 24-4, 23-8 and 32-10.

It doesn't reflect well on a school or conference's hockey program when the final score reads like a football game and the shots on goal resemble a lopsided basketball result.

Many coaches, including Varsity's

Tom Watt, have suggested that college hockey should be divided into two tiers, such as junior A hockey is presently organized. The argument is that under such a system the obvious mis-matches such as Varsity-Ryerson would not occur, and consequently all games would be more competitive and meaningful for players, coaches, and spectators alike.

However, such a realignment requires the support of the weaker teams, and to date their athletic directors have firmly opposed any change in the present arrangement. How could we ever admit to our students that we are second rate, they claim. Schools such as Brock, Windsor and Ryerson counter the two-tier plan by insisting that only by playing against, and being clobbered by, the powers such as Toronto will the calibre of hockey improve throughout the league.

Regardless of which argument has greater intrinsic merit, the weaker schools have the votes to block any realignment at the OUAA or CIAU level, and for the next few years we will probably have to endure more meaningless evenings such as Wednesday's.

The weaknesses of the present scheduling might not have been so apparent had the Rams Ryerson not played so well for their limited abilities and lack of practice time. However, their coach, former Blue stalwart Brian Jones, took the cue from Carleton and RMC and instructed his players to check Blues in their own end right from the opening faceoff.

Rams had absolutely no offensive potential, and the opening stanza soon developed into a continual Varsity seige around goaltender Ken Hall, who somehow managed to stop 21 of 24 shots fired his way. Meanwhile, a lonely Jim Campbell in the Blues net struggled to stay awake as even the usually cacophonous LGMB succumbed to the dreary tempo of the proceedings.

Gord Davies opened the scoring early, but many long minutes passed before Mike Lauder and Don Pagnutti upped the count to 3-0.

The second period saw more of the same and Watt apparently caught the tenor of the times as he abandoned the bench for a somewhat more lofty view in the press box. Blues continued to play down to Ryerson's level and despite a total control of the game, they managed but four more goals, from Bill Fifeild, Ivan McFarlane, Bill Hews and Kent Ruhnke.

Entering the final period, Rams made two moves which altered the entire tone of the game. First, Jones replaced a weary Hall with Trent Armstrong, and second Ryerson forward Mike McElwain exploited Blues defensive sloppiness by tipping a perfect pass behind Campbell after only 28 seconds.

Like a sleepy Frank Mahovlich wakened from his lethargy, Blues suddenly snapped to life and rapped five quick goals past Armstrong in just less than four minutes.

Ruhnke started and ended the deluge with perfect shots on breakaways, and in between Pagnut-ti, Davies and John Richmond added the others.

The thirteenth goal typified Ryerson's frustration as Lauder slid a lazy pass from the blueline that all five defenders fanned at until Ron Harris arrived to flip it past Armstrong.

Pat Grant scored Ryerson's second goal on a hard 25-footer and Fifeild completed the scoring as the Ram defence floundered helplessly.

Blues took eight of 14 minor penalties and the game's only other noteworthy feature was the debut of former Varsity writer Jean Bubba as scorer and PA announcer, perhaps as an indication of the eventual integration of intercollegiate athletics rumored to be coming shortly.

Thirteen may be Blues' unlucky number as their winning streak gets its toughest test to-morrow against Queens in Kingston; next home game is the traditional exhibition match with Loyola on Feb. 1 at 8 pm.

B'ball Blues devour Rams

by JON FRIED

The Varsity basketball Blues executed the fast break to near perfection in routing the Ryerson Rams 119-62 Wednesday night at Hart House.

The game was the second meeting of the two teams this year. The Blues won the first in a November squeaker, 55-52. The 119 points on Wednesday was the highest for the Blues this season and the first time this year the team has entered triple figures. The total fell short of the O.U.A.A. mark of 134, set by U of T against McGill in the 1960's.

The Rams held the Blues to a 10-10 tie during the first eight minutes of play with an effective full court press, as both teams adjusted to the miniscule dimensions of the Hart House floor.

The Blues began to reply in kind mid-way through the first half, as ball-hawking guards Doug Fox and Avo Albo, along with versatile Randy Filinski caused Ryerson turnovers that resulted in 19 straight Blues points.

Ryerson's sole scoring threat from the base line, Dave Fogolin, was forced out of action not long after, following a collision, and at the completion of the first twenty minutes of play the Blues were in possession of a 59-29 lead.

Blues' coach John McManus made adequate preparations at the intermission for Ryerson's full court press in the second half. Utilizing centreman Bryan Skyvington and Frank Cress, as well as the speed and hustle of Fox, Albo, and Filinski, the Blues maintained a 40 point margin throughout the final 20 minutes.

Randy Filinski, who filled in at each position Wednesday, led all scorers with 26 points. Bryan Skyvington, combining tip-ins with fast break lay-ups, had 22. Guards Avo Albo and Doug Fox had 15 and 13 respectively. 6'7" Frank Cress got 11.

Bill Birnbaum notched all of his 10 points in the first half before getting into foul trouble. Every Varsity player was on the score sheet by the conclusion, giving Blues fans additional reason to cheer in the latter stages of the contest.

Rick Hagerman, playing all but two minutes of the game for Ryerson, led the Rams scoring with 17. Dave Fogolin collected 15 in spite of his collision and Bill Barlow nailed 13.

The game was the only one the Blues will play in Hart House this season, although all team practices are held there. The Blues' next game is tomorrow at 2 pm in the Benson Building as the Queen's Golden Gaels come to town. Admission is free.

Strachan's Folly fall

The venerable father Episkopom must have smiled on his loyal Trinity basketball team, Strachan's Folly. Improving from their 63-0 defeat at the hands of Vic III, they actually stumbled into double figures, losing to the Grungies 37-13. Centre Tom Hurka (all of 5'3") stuffed one in the dying seconds but he was sitting on George Freguson's shoulders (this happened - honest!) Trin undoubtedly psyched-out the Grungies with their bizarre pre-game callisthenics performed in academic gowns. They jumped off to an incredible 2-0 lead on an unexpected outbreak of skill by Tom de Wolf. The opening prayer and a field goal attempt from the running track were simply not enough to help the Anglicans, though Grungies gradually whittled away Trin's lead and went on to win, thrilling the overflow crowd. Chicoinc led the Grungies with 12 points. Sabatini added 10 more and Schoenhardt rounded off the binge with 6 points.

High shooter for the Big Red was Don Orr with four. Hurka added two and several other players hit the score sheet.

However Varsity staffer Bob Bettson and former Varsity sports editor Chris Robinson were blanked, showing that politics and basketball don't mix.

After the game the Trinity squad told its enthusiastic cheering section "next time we'll hit 20."

Blues and Ryerson players fight for the basketball. Toronto went on to demolish the Ryerson Rams 119-62 in Hart House.

Cadillac first in line for SMC land

By DAVID SIMMONDS

There is a peaceful little vale that once had a purpose, tucked away in a corner of Forest Hill.

Ever since the Spadina Expressway idea was squashed by the provincial government, this land is up for grabs.

The price: $4.25 million, the owner: U of T's St. Michael's College. St. Mike's needs the money, but it looks like selling the land would sacrifice another chunk of land to high-rise development, in an area of town that would least like to be surrounded by tall buildings.

The Varsity File: St. Michael's

"We own the land. We need the money," says SMC president John Kelly.

The land is on the edge of the Cedarvale ravine, close to the corner of St. Clair Ave. and Bathurst St., in what could be called a "nice" area of town. The total area is 10.31 acres, 8.76 acres of it in Forest Hill and another 8.76 acres in the Borough of York.

First option on the St. Mike's land, including the land in York, is owned by Cadillac Development Corp.

St. Mike's president Father John Kelly admits Cadillac owns the option on the land—"I guess you'd call it that"—but stresses negotiations are "all contingent."

"We own the land. We need the money," said Kelly. "You can add that up."

Cadillac hired local architect Jack Diamond to develop proposals for the site. Diamond has been responsible for a number of innovative design proposals in the city, including the integration of existing houses on Sussex Avenue with the new Innis College building.

After he was approached by Cadillac, Diamond said, he insisted the first move was to contact local residents. "We did not go to them with a scheme," he said.

Diamond eventually developed a proposal for a "low rise, medium density scheme." He suggested a series of graded building heights, with the lowest building along the ravine edge.

The higher buildings, to the east and south, would still be lower than the surrounding buildings. Diamond also proposed public access walkways to the ravine edge.

Tableland, Diamond said, should be a place to experiment with housing.

Negotiations between Diamond, representing St. Mike's and Cadillac, and residents, took a place during July and August. However, negotiations broke off after the residents decided what they wanted was not development at all, but the creation of a park on the tableland, in addition to the already-designated ravine.

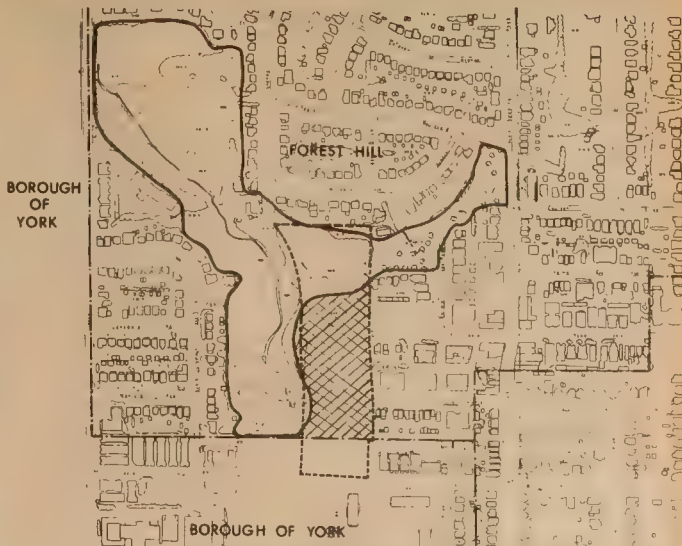

The construction of the Spadina subway will not only create pressure for development, but also create pressure for more open space in the area.

According to Judy Kjellberg, an assistant to Ward 11 Alderman Anne Johnston, who is involved in negotiations, "the residents have been collecting themselves." The residents plan to meet Johnston at the end of this month to launch a campaign to set the St. Mike's tableland aside as a park.

The residents have already sent a letter to Metro parks commissioner Tommy Thompson asking Metro to buy the St. Mike's property, including the ravine land.

If Metro does attempt to buy the land for a park, it will confront the St. Mike's offer of $4.25 million.

Until Metro or the city makes a decision on whether or not to buy the property, development proposals remain stalled.

Cadillac has its eyes and options on this Forest Hill property.

According to Diamond: "the project so far as I'm concerned is stalled—we haven't done anything with it for ages."

Kelly says he has not heard from the city regarding the offer to sell the land to the city.

St. Mike's would dearly like to reap substantial benefit from sale of the land. Back in 1972, Kelly admitted "It's an annual fight to stay alive. We live from one year to the next."

Because of its affiliation with the Roman Catholic Church, the college is not eligible for the same level of government funding as the federated, non-affiliated colleges.

However, Kelly has been reluctant to consider giving up the religious affiliation of the college, and its autonomy within the university.

Admission standards differ

Some colleges have higher academic standards in the admission of first year students than others.

That fact emerges—a touchy one in the light of President John Evans' proposals that the college departments in college subjects be amalgamated into university departments—emerges from a "restricted" document distributed to academic affairs committee members as background information for last Tuesday's meeting.

The document, entitled "College Faculty Admission Scholarship Availability For First Class Students" lists the number of first-year Ontario Scholars each college had, in 1972-73 in relation to total first year enrolment.

About 69 per cent of all of University College's first year are Ontario Scholars—484 students out of 694.

Only Trinity College comes close: 58.6 per cent of its first year students are Ontario Scholars—178 students out of 306.

Scarborough and Erindale have the lowest percentage in regards to total enrolment of grade 13 students with over 80 per cent in first year, 5.5 per cent (54 students out of 977) and 5.8 per cent (52 out of 889).

Victoria, St. Michael's, New and Innis Colleges fall in between: 36.8 per cent (314 out of 851), and 19.4 per cent (42 out of 216) 32.2 per cent (234 out of 711); 30.7 per cent (193 out of 628); respectively.

The document lists other divisions of the university.

More than half of Pharmacy's student body are Ontario scholars: 99 students out of 164.

The same is true of Dental Hygiene: 27 out of 52.

The per centages go down from Applied Science and Engineering (30.6 per cent: 169 students out of 551).

Just over 22 per cent of the Faculty of Food Sciences' first year students (18 out of 80) are Ontario Scholars.

And it's 20.8 per cent for nursing (25 out of 120); 17.5 per cent for Architecture (17 out of 97); 14.5 per cent for Physical and Health Education (16 out of 114); and 13.7 per cent for Music (17 out of 124).

When it comes to total admission awards, the U of T lead doesn't quite the province in either numbers of these awards on their dollar value. This year, the university granted $262,900 in awards to 459 people down fractionally from last year.

The 1972-73 figures were tops in the province, but a huge increase in admission awards at the University of Western Ontario, from $66,300 to $310,500 in the last two years dominated U of T to second place, followed by York, with $204,000 and Queen's, with $112,000.

Oil companies fix prices: US investigators

Secret documents held by senior officials of the executive branch of the US government reveal massive price fixing by the gigantic oil companies to increase prices, according to US Senate investigators.

In addition, US government figures released over the weekend show 10 times less of an oil shortage than the oil companies had announced earlier in the week.

Related developments show major oil firms in the US and Canada reporting up to 70 per cent increases in earnings for the fourth quarter of 1973, the three-month period when the so-called "energy crisis" started to hit North America.

US Senator Frank Church (Dem.-Idaho) charged Friday 62 secret documents are held by the National Security Council, the US state department and the justice department which prove the price-fixing cartel among the large oil firms.

He said he and his staff have found the last six US presidents—including Nixon—have allowed America's major oil companies to monopolize production of Mideast oil to force prices and profits up.

Church says his staff has uncovered a 1971 deal in which then attorney-general John Mitchell agreed not to press anti-trust action against the oil firms which had formed a cartel to negotiate group prices with Arab oil-producing countries.

This 1971 deal, according to Church's staff, resulted in the current price spiral of oil products.

In some areas of the US a US gallon of gas costs 70 cents or more. Those same areas once had 35-cent per gallon gas three and four years ago.

Church is chairman of the Senate's subcommittee on multinational corporations, which plans to open hearings Wednesday into the role of oil corporations in US foreign policy.

The National Security Council, which Church says holds part of the 62 secret documents proving the price fixing, is a closed-door top-level foreign policy making body including President Richard Nixon and Secretary of State Henry Kissinger.

While the oil companies deny the charge, independent US government sources indicate far more petroleum products available than the oil industry is saying.

See related stories, p.3

The US government's Federal Energy Office, under the control of energy czar William Simon, said Friday US crude oil stocks decreased only 800,000 barrels the previous week.

This figure flies in the face of the 8.6 million barrel shortage alleged by the petroleum industry's American Petroleum Institute. An API spokesman said he could not account for the discrepancy.

The accusation of excessively high oil company profits received impetus following release last week of the year-end profit picture for three of the five largest oil producers in the US: Exxon, Texaco and Mobil.

All three reported record earnings. The largest, Exxon—formerly Standard Oil of New Jersey—tallied annual earnings of $2.44 billion.

Imperial Oil is the Canadian subsidiary of Exxon, and Imperial reported an increase of $71 million in profit for a record total profit of $228 million in 1973.

Texaco, the second-largest US producer, reported a consolidated net income for 1973 of $1.29 billion, a 45.4 per cent increase over 1972 earnings of $889 million.

Mobil Oil's profits leaped during the final quarter with a total of $271.6 million for the three-month period, and increase of 68.2 per cent from the same period in 1972.

Mobil reported earnings for the year of $842.8 million an increase of 46.8 per cent from 1972.

While the oil companies figures themselves are dramatic, an independent consultants firm in Washington, Stanley Rutterberg and Associates, says it's been going on for a while, and points out the five largest US oil firms made more than $4 billion in profits in 1971.

The three oil companies who released their figures admitted most of their profit growth was from foreign operations.

Texaco, for instance, saw its major jump in profits during the final quarter of 1972 when the energy crunch was allegedly pinching producers.

During that three-month period

Texaco's net earnings were $453.5 million, up 70.1 per cent over the last quarter of 1972.

Aside from Imperial Oil, Exxon's subsidiary, Texaco's subsidiary in Canada surprised analysts by reporting a fourth quarter dividend of $5.68 per share compared to $4.35 a year earlier.

Earlier predictions had projected a Texaco Canada fourth-quarter profit of about $5.15 to $5.40 per share.

While the big oil companies report profitable pickings outside the US, smaller oil companies are doing well, too, if British Columbia is any indication.

A spokesman for Standard Oil of B.C., a subsidiary of Standard Oil Co. of California, admitted over the weekend the firm paid no federal income tax from 1965 to 1972.

But he said it was all quite legal because Canadian federal law allows oil companies to offset the costs of exploration against income.

BC Premier Dave Barrett has called for an inquiry into the taxes paid by resource-based industry. The BC firm makes about 18,000 barrels of oil per day for western Canada

More wiretapping last year

Those mysterious clicks and scratches on the telephone just might not be a rain storm.

Metro's finest admit putting 390 taps on various telephones last year, up from 300 in 1972.

Police say 36 of those taps were used by the intelligence bureau, sometimes known as Toronto's Red Squad. However police say only two taps involved "subversive activities."

Metro figures do not reveal the total number of taps at work in Toronto, as the RCMP also has authority to tap phones.

Like-wise, the Metro police figures only reveal the number of legal taps.

Chief Harold Adamson argued strongly during Parliament's debate on the new wiretap law that police should be able to use the byproducts of illegal wiretaps in court evidence.

The future of police wire-tapping is not what it used to be, according to Adamson, who says the new wiretap legislation will "vastly curtail" police eavesdropping.

However, Adamson and the tap specialists will probably have until May before the legislation is brought into effect, according to the federal justice ministry.

A spokesman for Justice Minister Otto Lang said the reason for the delay is to warn Canadians of the forthcoming proclamation of the new law.

One clause in the law provides a person whose phone is being tapped is to receive notice of the tap within 90 days of its being placed if no charges are laid. However, that notification can be delayed if police convince a judge an ongoing investigation would be jeopardized.

Metro's official records indicate most police taps were used in drug trafficking cases, although an assortment of other offences were listed including: robbery, fraud, bombing, and extortion.
